may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred, to his own ruin. That that suspected his own worth, or other mens opinions, thinking the less regard is had of his person, than he believeth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authority, in purchasing the name of a severe Man. For the affected sorrowful of a vain fellow, doth many times resemble the gravity of one that is wise: and the fear wherein they live, which are subject unto oppression, carries a shew of reverence, to him that does the Wrong; at least it serves to dazzle the Eyes of Underlings, keeping them from prying into the weakness of such as have jurisdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well using it, Men might attain to be such as they ought, they do usually mispend, in seeking to appear such as they are not.

This is a vain and deceivable course; procuring, instead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence; especially when an unlabile Spirit, being over-perterbed with so high authority, is too passionate in the execution of such an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amasia thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, what did he else than strive to make the people to think he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to believe, that he did not love them? The best was that he had, by revenging his Fathers death, provided well enough for his own security; but who should take vengeance; (or upon whom?) of such a murder, wherein every one had a part? Surely God himself, who had not given commandment or leave unto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the blood of his anointed. Yet as Amasia, careless of God, was carried headlong by his own affections; so his Subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged unto their duties, rose up against him, with such headlong fury, that being unable to defend himself in Jerusalem, he was driven to forsake the City, and tie to Lachis, for safeguard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceived against him, and so general, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capital City, nor his presence in the Country abroad procure friends, to defend his life. Questionless, he chose the Town of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found he there none other favour, than that the people did not kill him with their own hands: for when the Conspirators (who troubled not themselves about raising an Army for the matter) sent pursuers after him, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the utmost City of his Dominion Weltward, standing somewhat without the border of Juda; so that he might have made an easie escape (if he durst adventure) into the Territory of the Philistines, or the Kingdom of Israel. Therefore it may seem that he was detained there, where certain it is that he found no kind of favour: for had not the people of this Town, added their own treason to the general insurrection; the murderers could not at so good leisure as they did, have carried away his body to Jerusalem, where they gave him burial with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancy, that was in the Kingdom of Juda, after the death of Amasia.

It hath already been shewed, that the reigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by complete years; otherwhiles, by years current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last years of his Fathers Reign, or the foremost of his Sons. But we are now arrived at a meer vacancy, wherein the Crown of Juda lay void eleven whole years: a thing not plainly let down in Scriptures, nor yet remembered by Josephus, and therefore hard to be believed, were it not proved by necessary consequence.

Twice we find it written, that Amasia King of Juda, lived after the death of Joas King of Israel fifteen years; whereupon it follows, that the death of Amasia, was about the end of fifteen years complete, which Jeroboam the second (who in the fifteenth year of Amasia was made King over Israel) had reigned in Samaria. But the succession of Uzzias (who is also called Asa), unto his Father in the Kingdom of Juda, was eleven years later than the sixteenth of Jeroboam: for it is expressed, that Asa began to Reign in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam; the sixteenth year of his life, being joynted with the first of two and fifty that he Reigned. So the Interregnum of eleven years cannot be divided, without some hard means used, of interpreting the text otherwise than the letter founds.

Yet some conjectures there are made, which tend to keep all even, without acknowledging any void time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam, we should perhaps understand the seven and twentieth year of his life; or else (because the like words are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Asa was eleven years under age, that is five years old, when his Father died, and so his sixteenth year might concur with the seven and twentieth of Jeroboam; or that the text it self may have suffered some Wrong, by miswriting twenty seven for seventeen years, and so, by making the seventeenth year of Jeroboam to be newly begun, all may be saved. These are the conjectures of that worthy Man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the author himself doth easily let it pass, as impracticable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it left, that upon every doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Asa began his reign, being five years old; but then must we add those eleven years which passed in his minority, to the two and fifty that followed his sixteenth year, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so careful to avoid an interregnum in Juda, seeing that the like necessity hath enforced all good writers to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few years, in the Kingdom of Israel? The space of time between Jeroboam's death, and the beginning of Zacharias's Reign, and such another gap found between the death of Peky, and the beginning of Ezias, have made it easily to be admitted into Samaria, which the consideration of things as they stood in Juda, when Amasia was slain, doth make more probable to have happened there, yea although the necessity of computation were not so apparent.

For the publick fury, having so far extended it self, as unto the destruction of the Kings own person, was not like to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redress of those matters, which had caused it at the first to break forth into such extremity. We need not therefore wonder how it came to pass, that they which already had thrown themselves into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crown from a Prince of that age, which being invested in all ornaments of regality, is nevertheless exposed to many injuries, proceeding from headstrong and forgetful Subjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Asaria to have been King but one and forty years, after he came out of his nonage; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harshly with the text. The best opinion were that, which gives unto Jeroboam eleven years of reign with his Father, before he began to reign single in the fifteenth of Amasia; did it not swallow up almost the whole reign of Joas, and extending the years of those which reigned in Israel (by making such of them complete, as were only current) and take at the shortest the Reigns of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: every Man may follow his own opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronological Table, drawn for these purposes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporary with Amasia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THE Princes living with Amasia, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were Joas and Jeroboam in Israel; Cephenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Sylvius Aladus, and Sylvius Avemnius in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Phredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedaemon Theclitus, in whose time the Spartans war from the Achaïans, Geracles, Amyche, and some other Towns.

But more notable than all these, was Affiryan Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amasia succeeding his Father Ocraceps or Anacyndanaxes, reigned twenty years, and was slain the last of the eleven void years which forewent the Reign of Asaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Nimro, which had held Empire one thousand two hundred and forty years. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was passing away his time among Strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparel and behaviour.

In these voluptuous courses he lived an unhappy life, knowing himself to be so vile, that he durst not let any Man have a sight of him; yet seen he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who governed Media under him, finding means to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that base spectacle, of a Man disguised in Womens attire, and striving to counterfeit an Harlot, that he thought it great shame to live under the command of so unworthy a creature. Purposing therefore to free himself and others from so base subjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Belsus or Belsus a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdom of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with this prophecy, did promise unto Belsus himself the government of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the business, one of them stirred up the Medes, and allured the Perfians into the quarrel, the other persuaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These four Nations armed forty thousand Men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himself, but gathering such Forces as he could, out of other Nations, encountered the Rebels, as one that would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that War, answer to the manner of his reticence. For in three battels he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearful terms, that had not Belsus promised them constantly some unexpected succours, they would forthwith have broken up their Camp. About the same time, an Army out of Bactria was coming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountering it upon the way, persuaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those Forces joined themselves with his. The sudden departure of the Enemy seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feign his Army, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came upon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through over-great security, was unprepared for resistance.

This overthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his Wives brother Salomon to keep the Field, he withdrew himself into the City of Nimro; which, till new aids that he sent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it having been prophesied, that Nimro should never be taken, till the River were enemy to the town. Of this greatness and strength of Nimro, enough hath been spoken in our discourse of Nimro. It was so well vintualled, that Arbaces (having in two battels overthrown the Kings Army, and slain Salomon) was fain to lie two whole years before it, in hope to win it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seems that he wanted Engines and skill to force those walls, which were a hundred foot high, and thick enough for three Chariots in front to pass upon the rampire. But that which he could not do in two years, the River of Tygris did in the third: for being high swollen with rains, it not only drowned a part of the City through which it ran; but threw down twenty furlongs of the wall, and made a fair breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no means of resistance left, shutting up himself into his Palace, with his Wives, Eunuchs and all his treasures, did let the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a City Strabo of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that City and Tarsus upon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding Men eat and drink, and make merry, encouraging either, with verses well known, to a voluptuous life, by his own example, testifies that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any virtue becoming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more general consent of writers agree with this Relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greek writer, that lived in the Court of Perſia, where the truth might best be known. Concerning

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Affria, from the time of Sennanis, unto Sardanapalus, though I believe that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orſius hath it, incessantly) buffed; in offensive or else defensive arms; yet for the most part of them I do better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith, that their names were overpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatsoever they did; that which Theophilus Antiochensis hath said of them is very true; Silence and oblivion hath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of UZZIA.

§. I.

The prosperity of Uzzia, and of Jeroboam the second, who Reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zacharia, Sallum, Menahem and Pekahia.

UZZIA, who is also called Azaria the Son of Jotham, was made King of Juda, when he was sixteen years old, in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam the Son of Joas King of Israel. He served the God of his Father David, and had therefore good success in all his enterprises. He built Elath, a Town that stood near to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. He overcame the Philistines, of whose Towns he disannulled some, and built others in sundry parts of their Territories. Also he got the mastery over some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him Tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous Wars, wherein (as Josephus reherceth his Acts) he began with the Philistines, and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Army consisted of three hundred and seven thousand Men of War, over which were appointed two thousand six hundred Captains. For all this multitude the King prepared Shields, and Spears, and Helms, and other Armes requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite unto that which some of his late Predecessors had held, who thought it better policy to use the service of the Nobility, than of the multitude; carrying forth to War the Princes and all the Chariots.

As the victories of Uzzia were far more important, than the achievements of all that had reigned in Juda, since the time of David; so were his riches and magnificent works, equal, if not superior to any others that had been Kings between him and Salomon. For besides that great Conquests are wont to repay the charges of War with triple interest, he had the skill to use, as well as the happiness to get. He turned his Lands to the best use, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds convenient to such Husbandry. In other places he had Cattel feeding, whereof he might well keep great flocks, having won so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waste ground serving for pasturage. For defence of his Cattel and Herdmen, he built Towers in the Wilderness, He also digged many Cisterns or Ponds. Josephus calls them Water-courses; but in such dry grounds, it was enough that he found Water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers he commanded the water that none could without his consent, relieve themselves therewith; questionless he took the only course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship over all the Wilderness; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few springs therein found, are left free to the use of Travellers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Elath by the Red Sea, and of sundry Towns among the Philistines, he repaired the Wall of Jerusalem, which Joas had broken down, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The State of Israel did never so flourish, as at this time, since the division of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdoms. For as Uzzia prevailed in the South, so (if not more) Jeroboam the Son of Joas, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many Victories, against the Syrians, he won the Royal City of Damascus, and he won Hamath, with all the Country there about from the entering of Hannath, unto the Sea of the Wilderness, that is (as the most expound it) unto the vast Deserts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in the time of this Jeroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had been in the Reign of David.

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived so well; for he was an Idolater; it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the success of War, and to throw the victorious Aramites, under the feet of those, whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehoi, to which God had promised the Kingdom of Israel unto the fourth Generation, was now not far from the end; and now again it was revived unto repentance, by new benefits, as it had been at the beginning. But the sin of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, was held so precious, that neither the Kingdom it self, given to him by God, was able to draw Jehoi from that politic Idolatry, nor the misery falling upon him and his posterity, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperity, of Jeroboam the Son of Joas, to make him render the honour that was due to the only giver of Victory. Wherefore the promise of God, made unto Jehoi, that his Sons, unto the fourth Generation, should sit on the Throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but, being almost expired, gave warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we, who find no particulars recorded, can hardly guess at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Jeroboam the Son of Joas, after a victorious Reign of one and forty years, had ended his life, it seems in all relation that Zacharia his Son, should forthwith have been admitted, to Reign in his stead; the Nobility of that race having gotten such a lustre by the immediate succession of four Kings, Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crown paid by election, mult needs have appeared bafe; and the virtue of the laft King, having been fo great, as might well ferve to lay the foundation of a new Houfe, much more to eftablifh the already confirmed right of a family fo rooted in poffeffion. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty years did pafs before Zacharia the Son of Jerobam was, by uniform confent, received as King. The true original caufes hereof were to be found at Dan and Beitbel, where the golden Calves did ftand: yet fecond instruments of this difturbance, are likely not to have been wanting, upon which, the wisdom of Sam was ready to cast an Eye. Probable it is that the Captains of the Army (who afterwards flew one another, fo fast, that in fourteen years there Reigned five Kings) did now by headstrong violence, rent the Kingdom afunder, holding each what he could, and either defpifing or hating fome qualities in Zacharia; until, after many years, wearied with diffection, and the principal of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent Man, they confented to yield all quietly to the Son of Jerobam. That this Anarchy lasted almost three and twenty years, we find by the difference of time, between the fifteenth year of Uzzia, which was the laft of Jerobam his one and fortieth (his feven and twentieth concurring with the first of Uzzia) and the eighth and thirtieth of the fame Uzzia, in the laft fix months whereof, Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by fupposing Jerobam to have reigned with his Father eleven years, do cut off the interregnum in Juda (before mentioned) and by the fame reason, abridge this Anarchy, that was before the Reign of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leave it twelve years long: which is time fufficient to prove that the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, was no lefs diftempered, than as is already noted. But I chofe rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtful conjecture, that gives to Jerobam two and fifty years, by adding three quarters of his Fathers Reign unto his own, which was it self indeed fo long, that he may well seem to have begun it very young: for I do not think, that God blessed this Idolater, bygh with a longer Reign, and with a longer life, than he did his Servant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the Throne of Israel was void, before the Reign of Zacharia; little may suffice to be said of his Reign it self, while lasted but a little while. Six months only was he King; in which time he declared himself a worshipper of the Golden Calves, which was enough to justify the judgment of God, whereby he was slain. He was the laft of Yeho's house, being (inclusively) the first of that line; which may have been some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly fucceffion: the Prophecy having determined that race in the fourth Generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended unto the utmost) there was no warrant given to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had been given to Jehu, for the slaughter of Jerobam, and for the eradication of Ahab's Houfe.

Zacharia having been fix months a King, was then slain by Sallum, who reigned after him, the space of a month in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I do not find; save only that he was a Traitor, and the Son of one Tabeel, whereby his Father got no honour. It seems that he was one of those, who in time of Faction had laboured for himself; and now, when all other Competitors were fitten down, thought easily to prevail against that King, in whose person the race of Yehu was to fail. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong party: for Tabeel of Thafis, and the coast thereof even from Tzabab, where Benadom, his enemy and fupplanter, then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the Man that murdered him. Yet, as the end of one month, Sallum received the reward of his Treason, and was slain by Menadom who reigned in his place.

Menadom the Son of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten years. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhuman; For he not only destroyed Tabeel, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ripped up all their Women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty been used in revenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would have been as earnest, in procuring unto him his Fathers Crown when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was used such long deliberation, that we may plainly discover Ambition, Dildain, and other private passions, to have been the causes of this beastly outrage.

In the time of Menadom, and (as it seems) in the beginning of his Reign, Pul, King of Affrica, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appeased, with a thousand Talents of Silver, levied upon all the substantial Men in his Country. With this money the Israelite purchased, not only the peace of his Kingdom, but his own establishment therein: some factious Man (belike) having either invited Pul thither, or (if he came unbidden) fought to use his help, in deposing this ill-beloved King. Tophet reports of this Menadom, that his Reign was no milder than his entrance. But after ten years, his Tyranny ended with his life: and Pekabiah, his Son, occupied his room.

Of this Pekabiah the story is short: for hereigned only two years; at the end whereof he was slain by Pekai, the Son of Kemalia, whose Treason was rewarded with the Crown of Israel, as, in time coming another Maus Treason against himself shall be. There needs no more, to be said of Menadom, and his Son, save that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Son (as we find in Tophet) like to his Father in cruelty. Concerning Pul, the Affrican King, who first opened unto those Northern Nations the way into Palestina; it will shortly follow in order of the Story, to deliver our opinion: whether he were that Babylon (called also Babylon, and by some, Pul Belochus) who joined with Arabs the Medians, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other Man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Uzzia's life, who out-lived the happiness wherein we left him.

The end of Uzzia his Reign and Life.

AS the zeal of Yehoiada, that godly Priest, was the mean, to preserve the lineage of David, in the person of Joa; so it appears, that the care of holy Men was not wanting to Uzzia, to bring him up, and advance him to the Crown of Juda, when the hatred born to his Father Azaria, had endangered his Succession. For it is said of Uzzia, That he sought God in the days of Zacharia (which understood the visions of God) and when, as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.

Y. 15.

But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up in his deflection: for he transgressed against the Lord his God: and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incense, upon the Altar of incense. Thus he sought to enlarge his own authority, by meddling in the Priests office, whose power had in every extremity been so helpful to the Kings of Juda, that meer gratitude, and civil policy, should have held back Uzzia from encroaching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had been silent in this case, and not forbidden it. Howsoever the King forgot his duty, the Priests remembered theirs, and God forgot not to assist them. Azaria the High Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gave him to understand, how little to his honour it would prove, that he took upon him the office of the Sons of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourscore other Priests, valiant Men, but their valour was shewed, only in assisting the High Priest, when (according to his duty) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himself performed. We find in Tophet, that the King had appalled himself in Priestly habit, and that he threatened Azaria and his Companions, to punish them with death, unless they would be quiet. Tophet, indeed enlarged the story, by inserting a great Earth-quake, which did tear down half an Hill, that rouled four furlongs, till it rested against another Hill, stopping up the High ways, and spoiling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he saith, that the roof of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sun-beam did light upon the Kings face, which was presently infected with Leprosy. All this may have been true; and some there are who think that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they do much mis-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the days of Jerobam King of Israel, who died seven and thirty years before Uzzia; so that Jaham the Son of Uzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in government of the Land, should, by this account, have been then unborn: for he was but five and twenty years old, when he began to Reign as King. Therefore, thus far only we have assurance; that while Uzzia, was wroth with the Priests, the leprose rose up in his forehead, before the Priest. Hereupon he was caused, in haste, to depart the place, and to live in a house by himself, until he died; the rule over the Kings House, and over all the Land, being committed to Jaham, his Son, and Successor. Jaham took not upon himself the file of King, till his Father was dead; Whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument apart from the rest, because he was a Leper.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Aegypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Uzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hofea, Jeh, Amos, Obadiah and Jonas. It is not indeed set down, when Jeh, or Obadiah, did prophesie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to S. Hierome's rule) with the next before them; then must these two be judged contemporary with Hofea and Amos, who lived under King Uzzia. To enquire which of these five was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least, a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hath fo painfully been fought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquity of these holy Prophets? It seems to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Jonas, who foretold the great victories of Jerobam King of Israel; and therefore is like to have prophesied in the days of Joa, whilst the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter, the Text it self intimating no less: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose works are now extant. But his prophecies, that concerned the Kingdom of Israel, are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seems, not without reason, unto some very learned; to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose days Nineveh was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings unto extant: in all the rest are found express promises of the Messiah.

In the reign of Uzzia likewise it was, that Ezra, the first of the four great Prophets, began to see his Visions. This difference of greater and lesser Prophets is taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Augustin gives reason of the distinction) because the greater have written larger Books. The Prophet Ezra was great indeed, not only in regard of his much Writing; or of his Nobility, (for their opinion is rejected, who think him to have been the Son of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellency, both of his stile, and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole History of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Evangelist, as a Prophet; having written in such wife, That (as Jerome saith) one would think he did stir in not forget of things to come, but compile an History of past matters already past.

Bocchoris was King of Aegypt, and the ninth year of his reign, by our computation (whereof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Uzzia took possession of the Kingdom of Juda. After the death of Bocchoris, Alychis followed in the Kingdom of Aegypt, unto him succeeded Anysis; and these two occupied that Crown fix years. Then Sabacus, an Assyrian, became King of Aegypt, and held it fifty years, whereof the ten first ran along with the last of Uzzia his reign and life. Of these and other Aegyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affairs shall come to be intermeddied with the business of Juda.

In Athen, the two last years of Arifiron his twenty, the seven and twentieth of Thelpeus, the twentieth of Agamemnor, and three the first of Achilus his three and twenty, made even with the two and fifty of Uzzia: as likewise did in Alia the last seven of Sylusius Arcinimus his seven and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Sylusius Procas, and two and twenty the first of Sylusius Amulius. In Media Araces began his new Kingdom, in the first of Uzzia, wherein, after eight and twenty years, his Son Sofarnus succeeded him, and reigned thirty years. Of this Araces, and the division of the Affrican Empire, between him and others, who had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to use more particular discourse, that we may not wonder in too great uncertainty in the story of the Affrican Kings, who have already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of the Assyrian King, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belofus were one person; or both of sundry Families, that Reigned apart in Nimive and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly been shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent that the chief therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not only submit themselves in that War, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lives. The first example of this his power, was shewn upon Belofus the Babylonian, by whose especial advice and help, Arbaces himself was become so great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannical manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Belofus, he used the counsel of his own Captains, and then pardoned him of his own Grace; allowing him to hold, not only the City and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embellishing whereof his life had been endangered.

In like manner, he gave rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Provinces; retaining (as it appears) only the Sovereignty to himself, which to use immediately he did not naturally abhor. He is said, indeed, to have excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding unto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the City of Nimive; permitting the Citizens nevertheless to take and carry away every one his own goods. The other Nations that joined with him, as the Persians and Babylonians, he drew to his side, by the allurements of liberty; which he himself so greatly loved, that by slackning too much the Reins of his own Sovereignty, he did more harm to the general estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedom, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Country was pared narrower by Salmassar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom we find, in the Scriptures, to have held some Towns of the Medes; and the civil administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces, the fifth of Arbaces his Line, did make in that Government, by reducing them into stricter terms of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such, as might in fourscore years, if not sooner, both extend it self unto the Conquest of Israel, and tear away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Nimive, and subversion of the Assyrian Kingdom, whereof the Medes, under Arbaces, had the honour, who may seem at that time to have kept the Assyrians under their subjection, but in the rest of the Provinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who Reigning afterwards in Babylon and Nimive, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their History is made uncertain.

I will first therefore deliver the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that worthy Man Joseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereto, and the judgment of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followed the Ancients in this doubtful case. Neither shall it be needful to set down apart the several authorities and arguments of sundry Men, adding somewhat of weight or of clearness one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will do as briefly as I can; and without fear to be taxed of partiality, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancy of mine own, but merely led by those reasons, which upon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appear weak.

That which, until of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belofus was the same King who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Army; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Ammius his Authors with such as follow them, Paul Belochus. Of this Man it is said, that he was a skilful Astrologer, subtle, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Affria: finally, that he Reigned eight and forty years, and then dying, left the Kingdom to Teglat-Phalassar his Son, in whose posterity it continued some few descents, till the house of Heraclides prevailed. The truth of this, if Ammius his Metabornes were sufficient proof, could not be gainful: for that Author (such as he is) is peremptory herein. But, howsoever Ammius his Authors deserve to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirm. They, who maintain this Tradition, justify it by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant unto no History at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diadorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Belofus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Babylonians, who joined with them, were thought well rewarded with liberty, as likewise other Captains were with governments: but that any third Person was so eminent, as to have Affria itself, the chief Country of the Empire, bestowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any History. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed unto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meet to trust them in their own Walls and Houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nimive by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needful policy, because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept down, from aspiring to recover the Sovereignty, which else they would have thought to belong, as of right, unto the seat of the Empire.

Upon such considerations did the Romans, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Body politic, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Towns were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed over-dangerous even to Rome it self, that was Masters of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or four years had erected their Kingdom anew, under one Pul? or what must this Pul have been (of whose desertings, or intermeddling, or indeed of whose very name, we find no mention in the War against Sardanapalus) to whom the principal part of the Empire fell, fell, either by general consent in division of the Provinces, or by his own power and purchase very soon after? Surely he was none other than Belofus; whose near Neighbourhood gave him opportunity (as he was wise enough to play his own game) both to get Affria to himself, and to encompass any other Man, that should have attempted to seize upon it. The Province of Babylon, which Belofus held, being (as Hierodorus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a business: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his own hands all the Gold and Silver that had been in the Palace of Nimive. And questionless to restore such a City as Nimive, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belofus had; which Pul, if he were not Belofus, is likely to have wanted.

Besides all this, had Pul been a distinct person from Belofus, and Lord of Affria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have been an easy matter for him, to pass quite through another mans Kingdom with an Army, seeking booty afar off in Israel: the only action by which the name of Pul is known. But it we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers have called Belofus, Belses, and Belsus, (in like manner as Joseph acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called never otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the Son of Alyages, and called of the Greeks by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple utterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border upon Syria and Palestina: so that Belofus, having settled his affairs with good leisure enough upon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdom, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may find every one circumstance concurring, to prove that Phul who invaded Israel, was none other than Belofus. For the Prince, of the Arabians, who joined with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrown, did enter into that action, merely for the love of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of main importance, to those that were to pass over Euphrates with an Army into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitful Province, adjoining to their barren quarters, might yearly do them inestimable pleasures; was not only like to have quiet passage through their borders, but their utmost assistance; yea, it stands with good reason, that they, who loved not Israel, should for their own behoof have given him intelligence, of the destruction and civil broils among the ten Tribes; whereby, as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had for an heavy Neighbour of Jeroboam, recovered their own, setting up a new King in Damajco, and clearing the Coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wilderness to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations divided by Euphrates hold together in so good terms of friendship: it was ancient consanguinity; the memory whereof was available to the Syrians, in the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the River came over willingly, to the succour of Hadadeczer, and the Aramites about Damajco. So Belofus had good reason to look into those parts; what a King reigning so far off as Nimive, should have to do in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdom, had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

But concerning this last argument of the business which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, left it should seem to have ill coherence with that which hath been said of the long Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes. For if the Crown of Israel were worn by no Man in three and twenty years, then is it likely that Belofus was either unwilling to stir, or unable to take the advantage when it was fairest, and first discovered. This might have compelled those, who alone were not strong enough, to seek after help from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belofus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belofus did pass the River of Euphrates, as soon as he found likelihood of making a prosperous journey, then may it seem that the interregnum in Israel was not so long as we have made it: for three and twenty years leisure would have afforded better opportunity, which ought not to have been lost.

For answer hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of Orosius, where he suppotheth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldees, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius do concur, that the authority of Arbaces did restrain the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardless only of it self. Now, though some have conjectured that all Affria was given to Belofus (as an overplus, besides the Province of Babylon, which was his by plain bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high desertings, yet the opinion more commonly received is, that he did only encroach upon that Province by little and little, whilst Arbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly got it all himself. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelve years between the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Manabem his reign; manifest it is, that the conquest of Affria, and settling of that Country, was work enough to hold Belofus occupied, besides the reparation of Nimive, which alone was able to take up all the time remaining of his reign, if perhaps he lived to see it finished in his own days. So that this argument may rather serve to prove that Phul and Belofus were one person; forasmuch as the journey of Phul against Israel was not made until Belofus could find leisure; and the time of advantage which Belofus did let slip, argued his business in some other quarter, namely in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may be said, that he who conquered Affria, and performed somewhat upon a Country so far distant as Palestina, was likely to have been, at least, named in some History, or, if not himself, yet his Country to have been spoken of for those victories: but we neither hear of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoever of the Assyrians, done in those times; whereas of Belofus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we find good Record.

Surely, that great laughter of so many thousand Assyrians, in the quarrel of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate War, which overwhelmed the whole Country, not ending but with the ruine and utter desolation of Nimrod, mult needs have fo weakened the State of Affria, that it could not in thirty years Space be able to invade Palestina, which the ancient Kings, raising in Nimrod, did help to enable Belus to subdue it; who having once extended his dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interpolation of that Country, secure of the Syrians, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turn Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdoms, whereinto civil diffention of the inhabitants, and the bordering envy of the Arabians and Arames about Damascus, friends and consins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did invite him. For these, and the other before alleged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be understood of Belus; even as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artaxerxes, and Ahasuerus, with the like, are thought, or known, to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better known in their own Countries, have called Nabopolassar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes; especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, nor need to trouble our selves and others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted; other things, of more importance, will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belus, or some other man: the whole race of these Affrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabopolassar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopolassar (famous for the Astronomical observations recorded from their times) is the main ground of this contention. If therefore Belus or Belshazzar were that Pul which invaded Israel; if he and his posterity reigned both in Nimrod and in Babylon; if he were Father of Teglat-Pul-Asar, from whom Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assur-baddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seek Nabopolassar, the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other then Salmanassar, who is known to have reigned in those years, which Ptolemy the Mathematician hath assigned unto Nabopolassar. As for Mardocach, who supplanted Assur-baddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintain the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such conjectures. They lay hold upon the conclusion, and by taking that into pieces, hope to overthrow all the premises, upon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabopolassar, that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Affrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Pul and Belus were several Kings. This consequence is to plain, that it needs no confirmation. To prove that Nabopolassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworn to hold the contrary. For first, Nabopolassar was King of Babylon, and not of Affria. This is proved by his name, which is merely Chaldean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanassar's name, is proper to the Affrians. It is likewise proved by the Astronomical observations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Affrians, do shew, that Nabopolassar, from whom Ptolemy draws that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and not Affrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successor of Nabopolassar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his own language Mardocach-ken pad, but more briefly in Ezay his prophesy, Mardocach, by the former part of his name; or Mardocach Baladan, the Son of Baladan. Now if Mardocach, the Son of Baladan, King of Babel, were the Son of Nabopolassar, then was Nabopolassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Affria.

What can be plained? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabopolassar and Salmanassar, which in Greek or Latin writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanassar carried captive some part of the ten Tribes, it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it self. To conclude, Mardocach began his reign over Babylon in the sixth year of Hezekiah, at which time Salmanassar took Sennacherib; therefore, if Salmanassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Mardocach, yea and Nabopolassar, were all one Man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joseph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawn his proofs from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Pul Belus, for the proving that Pul and Belus were not sundry Kings; Joseph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painful Men be confest that they were, who by their diligence might have won the good liking of their Readers, had they not by mentioning Amnius his Authors given such offence, that Men refused thereupon to read their Books and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine own part, howsoever I believe nothing that Amnius his Berosus, Metasthenes, and others of that stamp affirm, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I not so squeamish, that I can well enough digest a good Book, though I find the names of one or two of these good fellows alledged in it: I have (some what peradventure too often) already spoken my mind of Amnius his Authors: nevertheless, I may say here again, that where other Histories are silent, or speak not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we find, and serve to explain or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeed are those honest and painful Men (as Scaliger terms them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good silly fellows) who let down the Affrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belus, and Salmanassar for Nabopolassar, such Writers as a Man should be ashamed or unwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Amnius, though did kill him in general) Gerard Mercator is not so light a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doors, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons between Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them Men notably learned: let us examine the arguments of Scaliger, and fee whether they be of such force, as cannot either be refuted or avoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabopolassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Affria, some Men doubt whether ther Scaliger's Reasons be enough to prove. For though Nabopolassar be a Chaldean Name, and Salmanassar an Affrian; yet what hindres us from believing, that one Man in two Languages might be called by two several Names? That Afronoe was flourished among either an Affrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himself calls them, Prophetas nescio quis, qui Nabopolassarum Afronem fuisse in fœnis viderunt; Prophetas I know not who, that in their sleep have dreamt of Nabopolassar, then he was an Afrologer.

Whether Nabopolassar were an Affrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintain the Negative. But as his being Lord over the Chaldeans, doth not prove him to have been learned in their Sciences; so doth it not prove him, not to have been also King of Affria. The Emperor Charles the fifth, who was born in Cam, and Philip his Son, King of Spain, and Lords of the Netherlands, had Men far more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematics, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spain, if Spain at that time had any; yet I think, Posterity will not use this as an Argument, to prove that Spain was none of theirs, It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabopolassar, did use the Affrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholars, that it seems, that he and his Posterity, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued; as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two unanswerable Arguments, (as Scaliger terms them, being methinks none other than Answers to somewhat that is or might be alledged on the contrary side) one of them which is drawn from the unlike found and writing of those Names, Salmanassar and Nabopolassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no Man will dispute, for it is not likeness of found, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of Persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it self: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing save conjecture against conjecture. But in that which is alledged out of the Prophet Ezay, concerning Mardocach the Son of Baladan, and in that which is said of this Mardocach, or Mardocempadus, his being the Successor of Nabopolassar, and his beginning to reign in the sixth year of Hezekiah, I find matter of more difficulty, than can be answered in half. I will therefore defer the handling of these Objections, until I meet with their Subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekiah, wherein Mardocach lived and was King. Yet that I may not leave too great a scruple in the mind of the Reader, thus far will I here satisfy him; that how strong soever this Argument may seem, Scaliger himself did live to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Mardocach to be the Son of Nabopolassar, he had been deceived.

Now therefore let us consider, in what sort they have falsified their Story, who taking Pul to be a distinct person from Belus or Belshazzar, have in like sort, as was necessary, distinguished their Offspring, making that of Pul to fall in Assur-baddon, which left all to Mardocach the Babylonian. And here I must first confess mine own want of Books, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this Narration into some such order, as might present unto us the Body of this History, in one view. Divers, indeed; there are, whom I have seen, that since Joseph Scaliger delivered his Opinion, have written in favour of some one or other point thereof: but Sihus Calvisius himself, who hath abridged Scaliger's learned Work, De emendatione Temporum, hath not been careful to give us notice, how long Belus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat-Pulassar, did reign, (perhaps because he found it not express'd in Scaliger) but is content to fer down Baladan, for the same Person with Nabopolassar, Which Scaliger himself revoked. In this case therefore I must lay down the Plot of these divided Kingdoms, in such sort as I find it contrived by Augustinus ornellus; who only of all that I have seen, sets down the Succession, Continuance, and Acts, of those that reigned in Affria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belus, and his Posterity, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Tornellius is a Regular Clerk of the Congregation of S. Paul, whose Annals were printed the last year; he appears to me a Man of curious Industry, found Judgment, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetful of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Books he hath received good Information, and enriching his Works by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this Business he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose help, without wrong or dishonour to himself, he hath both used and acknowledged. For mine own part, I will not spare to do right unto Tornellius, but confess my self to have received benefit by his writing; and with that his Annals had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed me in some things, so would he have instructed and emboldened me, to write more fully and less timorously in other things, which now I have not leisure to revise. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared lest it had over-haughtly passed out of my hand, and been expell'd out other Mens cogitations) of the four Kings that invaded the Valley of Siddim, and were slain by Abraham, I find him adventuring, as I C. 17. have done, to say, that they may probably be the thought to have been some petty Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let us consider how he hath ordered these last Affrian and Babylonian Kings.

After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mighty, fought to get all to himself, but was opposed by Belus; in which Contention, one Pul, a powerful Man in Affria, sided with Belus, and they two prevailed so far, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, between Oriens, Amhory, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Tornellius offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainty, that Arbaces made himself Sovereign Lord of all, and placed the Seat of his Empire in Media, appointing Belus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Pul in Affria. But in short space, that is, in four years, it came to pass, by the just Judgment of God, that Pul and Belus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus, and instead of being his Viceroy, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this later Opinion Tornellius himself leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former Supposition, telovling to hold the latter, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guess. Having thus devised, how Pul and Belus might, at the first, attain to be Kings, he orders their time, and their Successors, in this manner.

Four years after Arbaces, Phul begins to Reign, and continues eight and forty Years. Theglathophalar (whose Name, and the Names of other Princes, I write diversely, according as the Authors whom I have in hand are pleased to diversify them) succeeding unto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmassar followed him, and reigned ten. After him Senacherib reigned seven; and when he was slain, Asarhaddon his Son ten Years; in whom that Line failed.

The same time that Phul took upon him as King of Affria, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for so it had been more likely) Belus usurped the Kingdom of Babylon, and held it three-score and eight years; at the least three-score and eight Years did pass, before Nabonassar followed him in the Possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Babylon, are assigned six and twenty Years: then, two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardacampas; four and twenty to Ben Merodach; and lastly, one and twenty to Nabopolassar, the Father of Nebuchadnezzar, who is like to offer matter of further dispute.

Concerning the original of these Affrian and Babylonian Kingdoms, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other Men, who give all to Belus, and confound him with Phul, appear to me more nearly resembling the truth. Neither do I think, that Tornilius would have conceived two different ways, by which Phul might have gotten Affria (for how Belus came to get Babylon, it is plain enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He adheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on the sudden King of Affria, or to give him no noble a Province, as would, of it self, invite him to accept the Name and Power of a King, was a thing most unlikely to have happened, unless his deserts (whereof we find no mention) had been proportionable to so high a Reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he devised the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul, being one of the three that divided all between them, was utterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Division it self, and the Civil Wars that caused it, were never heard of, Questionless, the interverting of some Treasures by Belus, with his Judgment, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of far less note. Therefore I do not see, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoided; but that either we must confess, the Dominion given to Phul to have been exceeding his Merits, or else his Merits, and Name withal, to have been strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make us think, that rather the Conjecture, inferring such a Sequel, is wide of the Truth. As for the Rebellion of Phul and Belus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Affrians to recover such strength in Rebellion: for Belus, as might serve to hold out in Rebellion: for Belus, it was needless to rebel, considering, that Arbaces did not seek to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an over-great favourer of Liberty) even the Medes, that were under his own Government, to do what they listed.

But it is now fit that we peruse the Catalogue of these Kings: not passing through them all (for some will require a large Discourse in their own times) but speaking of their order and time in general. If it be so unlawful to think, that some of Ammius his Tales (let them not all be counted his Tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, especially such, as contradict no acknowledged Truth, or appear Likelihood, why then is it said, that Phul did reign in Affria eight and forty Years? For this hath no other ground than Ammius. It is true, that painful and judicious Writers have found this number of Years, to agree fully with the course of things in History: yet all of them took it from Ammius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Ammius his Forgery (as questionless he is often guilty of this Crime) that when he tells Truth, or Probability, he be not believed for his own sake; though for our own sakes we make use of his boldness, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) we are unwilling our selves to be Authors of new, though not improbable Conjectures. Herein we shall have this Commodity, that we may without blushing alter a little, to help our own Opinions, and lay the blame upon Ammius, against whom we shall be sure to find Friends that will take our part.

The Reigns of Theglathophalar and Salmassar did reach, by Ammius his Measure, to the length of five and twenty Years the one, and seventeen the other; Tornilius hath cut off two from the former, and seven from the latter of them, to fit (as I think) his own Conspiration; using the Liberty whereof I speak last: for that any Author, save our good Metaphyses, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did reign, it is more than I have yet found. To Senacherib and Asarhaddon, Tornilius gives the same length of Reign, which is found in Metaphyses. I think there are not many, that will arrogate so much unto themselves, as may well be allowed unto a Man so judicious as is Tornilius: yet could I wish, that he had forbore to condemn the followers of Ammius, in this Business, wherein he himself hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must have done, almost nothing.

The like Liberty we find that he hath used in measuring the Reigns of the Chaldeans; filling up all the space between the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the three-score and eight Years of Belus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that he thought Belus might have begun his Reign somewhat later than Phul: for three-score and eight Years would seem a long time for him to hold a Kingdom, that was no young Man when he took possession of it. But how is any whit of his Age abated by shortning his Reign, seeing his Life reached to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a private Man, enough for a long liver. Indeed, eight and forty Years had been somewhat of the most, considering that he seems by the Story to have been little less, at such time as he joined with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty Years did well deserve that note (which Tornilius adventitiously gives) that if his Reign extended not so far, then the Reign of such as came after him, occupied the middle time unto Nabonassar.

I neither do reprehend the boldness of Tornilius, in conjecturing, nor the modesty of Scaliger and Seibius Calvisius, in forbearing to set down as warrantable, such things as depend only upon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from us by Antiquity, must be described in History, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true discovery, that is, either by leaving some part blank, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of Loadstone, with Head-Lands, Bays, great Rivers, and other Particularities, agreeable to common Report, though many times controlled by following Experience, and found contrary to Truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allows not such Liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remediless oblivion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

— Neque fœvædis
Pars inclausa calaribus
Mundi, nec Borea finitimum Lævi, Duraæque Jole Nives,
Mæcæorum abignæ: horrida callidi Vincum æquora Navæ.

Nor Southern Heat, nor Northern Snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subject Regions can fence,
And keep the greedy Merchant thence.
The subtil Shipmen will find,
Storm never so the Seas with Wind.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, do serve only to mislead such Discoverers as rashly believe them; drawing upon the publishers, either some angry curies, or well deserved scorn; but to keep their own credit, they cannot serve always. To which purpose I remember a pretty Jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had been employed by his King in planning a Colony upon the Straights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some question about an Island in those Straights, which methought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his Enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters Wives Island; saying, That whilst the Fellow drew that Map, his Wife sitting by, desired him to put in one Country for her; that he, in imagination, might have an Island of her own. But in filling up the Blanks of old Histories, we need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should run backward, and by reworking the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appear ridiculous: What if some good Copy of an ancient Author could be found, shewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of these uncertainties? would it be more shame to have believed in the mean while, Ammius or Tornilius, than to have believed nothing. Here I will not say, that the credit, which we give to Ammius, may chance otherwise to be given to one of those Authors whose Names he pretends. Let it suffice, that in regard of Authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornilius, than Ammius; yet him than them, if his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seems to me; it having moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious dispute; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as have once gotten the credit of being general, so to deal as Pacuvius in Capna did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senators of the City to death. He lockt the Senators up within the State-house, and offered their lives to the Peoples mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, until the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The Condemnation was hasty; for as fast as every Name was read, all the Town cried, Let him die; but the Execution required more leisure; for in substituting another, some notorious Vice of the Person, or baseness of his condition, or insufficiency of his Quality, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: so that fading the worse and less Choice, the further and the more that they sought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

§. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

AFTER this division of the Affrian Empire, follows the inauguration of the Olympian Games, by Iphitus, in the Reign of the same King Ozzias, and in his one and fiftieth Year. It is, I know, the general Opinion, that these Games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Jotham: yet is not that Opinion so general, but that Authors, weighty enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things unto the sacred History, which are found in profane Authors, we should not be too careful of drawing the Hebrews to those Works of Time, which had no reference to their Affairs; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of Accounts, we joynt them to matters of Isaiah and Judas, where occasion requires.

These Olympian Games and Exercises of Activity, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the Race by his own Foot; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his Body. They took Name, not from the Mountain Olympus, but from the City Olympia, otherwise Pisa, near unto Elis; where also Jupiter's Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the Wonders of the World, was known by the Name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. These Games were exercised from every fourth Year compleat, in the Plains of Elis, a City of Peloponnesus, near the River Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many Years, till Iphitus by Advice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Lycurgus the Law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the Reign of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cædemon: others think that they were dissolved under Constantine the Great.

From this Institution, Varro accounted the Grecian times, and their Stories, to be certain: but reckoned all before either doubtful, or fabulous; and yet Pliny gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the Reign of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Cæsar, Polymius, and others hath gathered, in whole time the seven wise Grecians flourished. For Solon had speech with Cæxus, and Cæxus was overthrown and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing Brains have laboured to find out the certain beginning of these Olympiads; namely to set them in the true Year of the World, and the Reign of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first Account, that is, of the Worlds Year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian, and Didymus, begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Oflus or Azardus.

Enfibus who is contrary to himself in this Reckoning, accounts with those that find the first Olympiad in the beginning of the four hundredth and fifth year after Troy, yet he telleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of Uzzia, which is (as I find it) two years later.

Eratosthenes placeth the first Olympiad four hundred and seven years after Troy, reckoning the years that passed between; to whom Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The distance between the destruction of Troy, and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratosthenes. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his Posterity into Peloponnesus, were fourscore years; thence to the Ionian Expedition, threecore years; from that Expedition to the time of Lycurgus his Government in Sparta, one hundred fifty nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eighty years. In this Account the first year of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vain labour it were, to seek the beginning of the Olympiads; by numbring the years from the taking of Troy, which is of a Date far more uncertain. Let it suffice, that by knowing the inauguration of these Games, to have been in the four hundredth and eight year current after Troy, we may reckon back to the taking of that City, setting that, and other Accidents, which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads, must teach us how to find when they began.

To this good use, we have the ensuing years, unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided, by the same Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundred fourscore and seventeen years; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, eight, and forty years; forwards to the Victory of Lysander, seven and twenty; to the Battle of Leuctra, thirty four; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole sum ariseth to four hundred fifty and three years; which number be otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the Institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of Uzziah, we have Arguments, grounded upon that which is certain, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his Reign, and the death of Alexander; as also upon the Astronomical calculation of sundry Eclipses of the Sun, as of that which happened when Xerxes let out of Sardis with his Army to invade Greece; and of divers others.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his Reign as King, before he was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he reigned thirty years; they who give him but twenty nine years of Reign (following Herodotus, rather than Tully, Justin, Eusebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers, in the first year of the hundredth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexander's Death, serves well to lead us back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like Observations do. For if we reckon upwards from the time of Alexander, we shall find all to agree with the years of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his Reign, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdoms) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, unto the end of the Persean Empire, which was in the third of the hundredth and twelfth Olympiad, we find two hundred and thirty years complete: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which lasted but seven years, we find complete two hundred and seven years, which was the continuance of the Persean Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first year of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundredth and fortieth year from the institution of those Games by Iphius) followed the last of the seventy years, of the captivity of Juda, and defolation of the Land of Israel; manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seventy years; and one hundred threecore and ten years more, the last which passed under the Kings of Juda, to find the first of these Olympiads; which by this Account is the one and fiftieth of Uzzia, as we have already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serve well to the same purpose. For Examples sake, that which was seen when Xerxes mustered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundredth threecore and seventh year of Nabonassar, being the last of the threecore and fourteenth Olympiad; leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we have a fair way through the threecore and ten years, unto the destruction of Jerusalem; and so upwards through the Reigns of the last Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth year of Uzzia.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads began.

To tell the great solemnity of them, and wish what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say, that all bodily Exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Mastery in those Feats, whereby there was good use, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of Exercises, that served only for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable Quality, to make trial of their Skill. Yea the very Cyers, which proclaimed the Victories, contended which of them should get the honour, of having played the best part.

The Eleans were Presidents of those Games; whose Justice, in pronouncing without Partiality, who did best, is highly commended. As for the Rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palm, or Olive, without any other Commodity following, than the Reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had seen his three Sons crowned for their several Victories in those Games, one came running to him with this Gratulation: Morre, Diagoras, non enim in celum ascensurus es; that is, Die, Diagoras, For thou shalt not climb up to Heaven: as if there could be no greater happiness on Earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speaks of these Victors, calling them,

Quos Elea domum reducit Palma Castoris.

Such as like heavenly Wights do come With an Elean Garland home.

Neither

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or the Songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had won these Olympian Prizes; but even grave Historians thought it a matter worthy of their noting. Such was (as Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greeks, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour, to have won the Victory at Running or Wrestling in those Games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous Victory, or Conquest of a Province.

That these Olympian Games were celebrated at the Full of the Moon, and upon the fifth day of the Month Hecatembeon, which doth answer to our June; and what means they used to make the Month begin with the new Moon, that the fifth day might be the Full; I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now return unto the Kings of Juda, and leave the merry Greeks at their Games, whom I shall meet in more serious Employments, when the Persean Quarrels draw the Body of this History into the Coasts of Ionis and Hellas.

§. VI.

Of Jotham and his Contemporaries.

Jotham the Son of Uzziah, when he was five and twenty years old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Jerusalem, his Father yet living. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple of threecore cubits upright, and the threecore called Ophel: besides divers Cities in the Land of Juda, and in the Forests, Towers, and Balances, he enforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundredth Talent, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand Measures: he reigned fix and twenty years; of whom Isaiah gives this Testimony. Epiphanius very Principally says, ut nullum in eo virtutis genus desideret: ne quis Deum adeo pie coluerit, hominibus suis adeo iustitiam, artem ipsam tanta fide cura esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, ut universum regnum hominum quidem mirum contemderent, domesticis autem ejus modis atque civibus salix, fastum & fortissimum sua virtute esserit; This was such a Prince, as a Man could find no kind of Virtue wanting in him: he worshipped God so religiously, he governed his Men so righteously, he was so provident for the City, and did so greatly amplify it, that by his Virtue and Prudence he made his whole Kingdom not contemptible to his Enemies, but to his Servants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happy.

This is all that I find of Jotham: his Reign was not long, but as happy in all things, as he himself was devout and virtuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Phelstern in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which governed from year to year. And yet Pausanias in his second Book, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, that Corinth was governed by Kings of the Race of the Bacidae, to the time of Cypselus, who drove them out.

Teglabphalasser, or Teglabpheser, the Son of Phul, the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new Race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murdered his Master Pekaiab) was King thereof. In which Expedition he took most of the Cities of Neptalis and Galilee, with those of Gilead, over Jordan, and carried the Inhabitants captive. This Teglab reigned five and twenty years, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzenius finds, that with his Son Salmanser he reigned yet two years longer: which years I would not ascribe to the Son; because the era of Nabonassar begins with his single Reign, but reckon them to Teglab Phalassar himself, who therewith reigned seven and twenty years.

Aschylus, the Son of Agamemnon, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled five and twenty years. Alcarnenes governed Sparta: after whom the Estate changed, according to Eusebius; but therein surely Eusebius is mistaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witness the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, that Pausanias, a Prince of eminent Vertues, succeeded his Father, and reigned threecore years, and outlived the Messenian War: which was ended by Theopompus, the Son of Nicander, his Royal Companion.

At this time lived Nabum the Prophet; who foretold the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the City of Ninive; which succeeded (saith Isaiah) a hundred and fifteen years after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sofarnus and Medius reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

Achaz, or Achaz, succeeded unto Jotham in the seventeenth year of Pekah, the Son of Rimmon: the same being also the last year of his Father's Reign; who began in the second of the same Pekah, and reigned fifteen, but not complete years. This Achaz was an idolater, exceeding all his Predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his Son for Sacrifice before the Idol Atalch, or Saurim, which was represented by a Man-like brazen Body, bearing the head of a Calf, set not far from Jerusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is used for Hell. The Children offered, were inclosed within the Carcases of this Idol, and as the Fire encreased, so the Sacrificers, with a noise of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the Air, to the end the pitiful cries of the Children might not be heard: which unnatural, cruel, and devilish Oblation, Jeremy the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome upon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible sin was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomy, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Judea, divers Authors witness; as Virgil in the second of his Æneids—Sanguine placuisse, &c. and Silius,—Pelore caute Deo. Saurim is said to have brought this Custom into Italy, besides the calving of many Souls unto the River of Tiber, instead of which, Hercules commanded that the Waxen Images of Men should be thrown in and drowned. The Devil also taught the Carthaginians this kind of Butchery, in so much that when their City was besieged, and in distress, the Priest made them believe, that because they had spared their own Children, and had bought and brought up others to be offered, that therefore Saurim had stirred up and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest Youths of their City to be slain, and offered to Saurim or Saurim, to appease him: who besides these forenamed

§. II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the Reason of the Names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italy the Latines and Hætrurians were most famous, the Hætrurians having held the greatest part of it under their subjection; and the Latines by the virtue and felicity of the Romans, who were a Branch of them, subsiding all Italy, and in few Ages whatsoever Nation was known in Europe: together with all the Western Parts of Asia, and North of Africa.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnassæus, Varro, and Reynæcius (following them) think to have been Ætruscians; and this Name of Aborigines (to omit other significations that are strained) imports as much as Original, or Native of the place, which they possessed: which Title the Ætruscians are known in vaunting manner to have always usurped, fetching their Antiquity from beyond the Moon, because indeed, neither were the Inhabitants of Peloponnesus enforced to forsake their Seats, so oft as other Greeks were, who dwelt without that half Island, neither had the Ætruscians so unsure a Dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Country was less fruitful in Land, Mountainous, and hard of access, and they themselves (as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore having occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Ætruscian manner, stile themselves Aborigines, in that Language, which either their new Seat, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might be that the Ætruscians who dwelt somewhat far from Sea, and are always noted as unapt Men to prove good Mariners, should have been Authors of new Discoveries, were a Question not easy to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulness of Children, in which those Ages abounded, inforceth a superfluous Company to seek another Seat, and that some Expeditions of the Ætruscians, as especially that of Evander, into the same parts of Italy, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelasgi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gave Name to all Greece: but their Antiquities are long since dead, for lack of good Records. Neither was their Glory such in Italy, as could long sustain the Name of their own Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one People with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Ætolians, Armenians, Etrusci, and other People, did in Ages following disturb the Peace of Latium, which by Saturnus was brought to some Civility, and he therefore canonized as a God.

This Saturnus S. Augustinus calleth Serces or Serapis, others term him Stereus, and say, that he taught the People to dung their grounds. That Latium took his Name of Saturnus, because he did Lætare, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Jupiter, it is questionable a Fable. For as in Heathenish Superstition, it was great vanity to think that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many Gods of whom one fled from another; so in the truth of History, it is well known, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should be hard to find one Country or another, wherein a Man might be safe from his pursuit. And yet, as most Fables and poetical Fictions, were occasioned by some ancient truth, that Ætruscians, by the memory of speech or some allusion, they did mainly and darkly express (for so they feigned a passage over a River in Hell; because Death is a passage to another Life, and because this passage is hateful, lamentable, and painful; therefore they named the River Sisyx of Hate, Corymbus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Pain: so also because Men are stony hearted, and because the Greek Λαοί People, and Λαοί Stones, are near in sound, therefore they feigned in the time of Dædalus Stones converted into Men as at other times Men into Stones) in like manner it may be, that the original of Saturnus's hiding himself was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus; as it is noted in the Æt.; whence also Elyas of the true God says, tu Deus abscondi te. For it cannot be in vain that the word Saturnus should also have this very signification, if it be derived (as some think) from the Hebrew Satur, which is to hide: Howbeit I do not, but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

Reynæcius doth conjecture that the Cæteans, who descended of Cethim, the Son of Javan, were the Men who gave the Name to Latium. For these Cæteans are remembered by Homæ as Aiders of the Trojans in their War. Strabo interpreting the place of Homæ, calls them Subjects to the Crown of Troy. Hereupon Reynæcius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elæiæ, in the Elæiæ Territory, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City which the Æolians held in Asia, called Elæa, or Elaiæ, Paulanus makes mention: Stephanus calls it Colemi, or (according to the Greek writing) Colomni, which Name last rehearsed hath a very near sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cethim; the Greek Letter [D] having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to [T H] differing only in the strength or weakness of utterance, which is found between many English Words written with the same Letters. Wherefore that these Cæteans being descended of Cethim, Citim, or Cethim, the Son of Javan, who was Progenitor of the Greeks, might very well take a denomination from the City, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaiæ, or Elaiæ, it is very likely, considering that among the Ætruscians, Pociani, Ætolians, and Elæans, who all were of the Ætolique Tribe, are found the Names of the Mountain Elæus, the Haven Elæus, the People Elæia, the Cities Elæus, Elæia, and Elæia, of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine Tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other Name than Elaiæ, from whence Latium may come. Now whereas both the Cæte and Ætruscians, had their original from Cethim, it is something unlikely, that agreeing in Language and similitude of Names, they might nevertheless differ in found and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriving the Sabines from him) give the Name of Sabinus: in the like manner might he whom the Ætruscians would call Elaius (of which Name they had a Prince that founded the City Elæia) be named of the Cæteans Latinius. Reynæcius pursuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Eurypius, Lord of the Cæteans, being the Son of Telephus, whom Hercules begat upon Age, the Daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia, was slain by Achilles in the Trojan War: then did Telephus, Brother to Eurypius, conduct the Cæteans, who (fearing what evil might befall themselves by the Greeks, if the Affairs of Troy should go ill) passed into that part of Italy, where the Ætruscians were planted by Oenotrus. And Reynæcius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Ætruscians, by the memory of his Grand-mother

Age, was

Age,

Age, an Ætruscian Lady, was well contented to take an Ætruscian Name, and to be called Elaius, which in the Dialect and Pronunciation either of the Cæteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elaius, and then Latinius: That this Name of Elaius may have been taken or imposed by the Ætruscians; it is the more easy to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidus; the other of Elaius, who were Sons of Arcus King of Arcadia, which gave Name to the Country: and between these two Families the Succession in that Kingdom did pass, almost interchangeably for many Ages, till at the end of the Trojan War it fell into the hand of Hippothus of the Race of Elaius, in whose Posterity it continued until the last. Again, the Name Latinius, having a derivative found, agrees the better with the supposition of such an Accident. This is the conjecture of Reynæcius, which if he made over-boldly, yet others may follow it with the less reproof, considering that it is not easy to find either an apparent Truth, or fair Probability among these disagreeing Authors, which have written the Originals of Latium.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines until Aeneas his coming.

THE Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrival of Aeneas, were, Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, and Latinius. Of Saturnus there is nothing remembered, save what is mentioned already, and many Fables of the Greeks, which whether they be applicable to this Man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturn of the Greeks, called by them Xpion, or some other, filled Saturn by the Aborigines. For the Age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have been the hero, but the Names of * Stereus, and Stereus (for it may be this Name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the People, but rather the Soil which they laid on their Grounds, had that appellation from him) do rather make him seem some other Man.

* Piculus one calls the idols of deities then discovered. And hence it may be that in the Evangelist we read for Piculus, piculus, which is interpreted of an idol, it pleased God that in a like sense this name Stereus should stick unto him.

Of Picus it is said that he was a good Horfman. The Fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seem (as it is interpreted) to have grown from the skill he had in Sooth-saying, or Divination, by the flight and chattering of Fowls. Faunus, the Son of Picus, reigned after his Father. He gave to Evander the Ætruscian (who having slain by mischance his Father Echonus King of Arcadia, fled into Italy) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fauna, the Sister of Faunus, was also his Wife, as all Historians agree; she was held a Prophetess, and highly commended for her Charity; which Praise in her must needs have been much blest by her Marriage, it self being merely incestuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his Sister any Child, neither do we read of any other Wife which he had, save only that Virgil gives unto him Latinius as his Son, by a Nymph, called Marica.

But who this Marica was it is not found, save only that her Abode was about the River Liris near Minturna.

Of the Name Latinius, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted four: one, the Son of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Ulysses by Circæ, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice only Sabinus of the second, of whom he faith, that his Name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cæti, were from his Surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reynæcius, the difference conflicting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus, the Son of Hercules, whereas Reynæcius makes him his Nephew, by a Son of the same Name. This Latinius having obtained the Succession in that Kingdom after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter and Heir Lavinia, to Turnus the Son of Venulus, who was Sister to Amata Latinius his Wife.

But when Aeneas arrived in those Parts with fifteen Ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be embarked according to the rate which Trocy did allow to the Vessels then used, about one thousand and two hundred Men: then Latinius finding that it would stand best with his Assurance, to make Alliance with the Trojan, and moved with the great Reputation of Aeneas, which himself had heard of in the War of Troy, gave his Daughter to him, breaking off the former Appointment with Turnus, who incensed herewith, fought to avenge himself by War: which was soon ended with his own death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinius, it is very certain, that were she an Italian; she could not have born a Daughter marriageable at the arrival of Aeneas; unless we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cæti into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Son, who served in the last year of the Trojan War. But Reynæcius holds her an Asiatique, and thinks withal that Lavinia was born before Telephus came into Italy. That this Name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnassæus call her, was not proper, but rather a Surname, it may seem by Varro, who calleth her Palatia: which Name very well might be derived from the Greek Name Pallas. Amata, which signifieth beloved, or dear, was the Name by which the High Priest call every Virgin, whom he took to serve as a Nun of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easily to be thought a Surname, no sooner Virgil discourse of her and Venulus her Sister.

Lavinia, the Daughter of Latinius, being given in Marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdom of Latium, or the greatest part of that Country, was established in that Race: wherein it continued until it was over-grown by the Might and Greatness of the Romans.

§. IV.

Of Aeneas, and of the Kings and Governors of Alba.

Aeneas himself being of the Royal Blood of Troy, had the Command of the Dardanian: he was a valiant Man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his Wife Cressa, the Daughter of Procas, he had a Son called Ascanius; whose Surname was Iulus, having before the ruin of Troy (as Virgil notes) been Surnamed Iulus. But when Aeneas was dead, his Wife, Lavinia, the Daughter of Latinius, being great with Child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a Son, called thereupon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was born after his Father's Funeral. This Flight of Lavinia was to evil taken by the People, that Ancus procured her return, entreated her honourably, and using her as a Queen, did foster her young Son, his half-Brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ancus leaving to his Mother-in-Law the City Lavinium, which Ancus had built, and called after his new Wives Name, founded the City Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his Reign was, according to some, eight and twenty years; Virgil gives him thirty; others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his decease, there arose Contention between Sylvius, the Son of Ancus, and Tullus the Son of Ancus, about the Kingdom: but the People inclining to the Son of Lavinia, Tullus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his Race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdom to Sylvius Posthumus, whose Posterity were afterward called Sylvii.

The Reign of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each Man's Reign, I find thus set down.

1. Sylvius Posthumus	29
2. Sylvius Aeneas	31
3. Sylvius Latinus	50
4. Sylvius Alba	39

Years.

Alia, called also Rhea and Sylvia
Romulus Remus

The most of these Kings lived in Peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Towns in the Borders of Latinum: who finding much upon the Honour of their Original, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberinus some think that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albia: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tiberis, before the coming of Aeneas into Italy. The Mountain Aventinus had Name (as many write) from Aventinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein; but Virgil hath it of other wife. Tullus, the brother of Aventinus, is named by Ennius as Father of another Tullus, and Grand-Father of Julius Proculus, who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Namitor, the elder Son of Procas, was deprived of the Kingdom by his Brother Amulius; by whom also his Son Agrippa was slain, and Lia his Daughter made a Nun of Vesta, that thereby the Issue of Namitor might be cut off. But she conceived two Sons, either by her Uncle Amulius, as some think; or by Mars, as the Poets feign; or perhaps by some Man of War. Both the Children their Uncle commanded to be drowned, and the Mother buried quick, according to the Law; which so ordained, when the Vestal Virgins broke their Chastity. Whether it was so, that the Mother was pardoned at the entreaty of Ambo, the Daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein do vary) it is agreed by all, that the two Children were preserved, who afterward revenged the Cruelty of their Uncle, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Namitor their Grand Father to the Kingdom: wherein how long he reigned I find not, neither is it greatly material to know, for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latinum were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome; upon which the computation of Time following (as far as concerns the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Namitor, the Kingdom of Alba ceased; for Namitor left no male Issue. Romulus chose rather to live in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were governed by Magistrates; of whom only two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Clautius, who in the days of Tullus Hostilius, King of the Romans, making War upon ome, died in the Camp; and Metius Soffertius, the Successor of Clautius, who surrendered the Estate of Alba unto the Romans, having committed the hazard of both Signories to the success of three Men of each side, who decided the Quarrel by Combat: in which, the three Brethren Horatii, the Champions of the Romans, prevailed against the Curietis, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Alban Forces against the Veientes and Etruscans) withdrew his Companies out of the Battle, hoping thereby to leave the Romans to such an overthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deal with Tullus; who notwithstanding this falsehood obtained the Victory, did reward Metius with a cruel Death, causing him to be tied to two Chariots, and so torn in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patricians; among which were the Julii: of whom C. Julius Cesar being descended, not only gloried in his ancient, royal, and forgotten Pedigree, in full Assembly of the Romans, then governed by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare Industry, Valour, and Judgment, obtained the Sovereignty of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himself and his Posterity; whereby the Name of Aeneas, and Honour of the Trojan and Alban Race, was so revived, that seldom, if ever, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of Glory.

§. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus's Birth and Death.

OF Rome, which devoured the Alban Kingdom, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat uncertain) depend much upon the Birth and Education of Romulus, the Grand-Child of Namitor, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not only the bordering People, but all Nations between Euphrates and the Ocean were broken in pieces by the Iron Teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, having been the work of many Ages; whereof I now do handle only the first, as incident unto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Porcius Cato, Calpurnius Piso, Sempronius, and others, seek to derive the Romans from Tamus: but Herodotus, Marcellus, and many others of equal Credit, give the Grecians for their Ancestors: and as Strabo reports in his fifth Book; Cecilius verum Romanorum scriptor ex argumento colligit, Romanos a Graecis esse conditam quod Romani Graeco rina, antiquo infinito Herculi rerum faciant, matrem quoque Evandri venerantur Romani; Cecilius (saith he) a Roman Historiographer, doth by this Argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, because the Romans, after Greekish Fashion, by ancient Ordnance do sacrifice to Hercules: the Romans also worshipped the Mother of Evander.

Plutarch in the Life of Romulus remembers many Founders of that City: as Romanus the Son of Ulysses and Circé; Romus the Son of Emathion, whom Diomedes lent thither from Troy, or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who drove the Tyrians out of that Country, built it. Solinus bestows the honour of building Rome upon Evander, saying, That it was before times called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to a captive Lady, brought thither by the Grecians: others say, that it was anciently called Febria, after the Name of Febria, the Mother of Mars; witness Saint Augustine in his third Book de Civitate Dei. But Livie will have it to be the Work of Romulus, even from the Foundation: of whom and his Consorts, Juvenal to a Roman Citizen vaunting of their Original, answered in these Verses:

Maiores quosque primas fuit ille tuorum, Aut pastor fuit, aut silvā quod dicere nolo.*

Yet though thou fetch thy Pedegree so far;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepherd was, or elfe, that I'll forbear.
meaning either a Shepherd or a Thief.

Now of Romulus Begetting, of his Education and preservation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his Mother, and Mars was supposed to be his Father; that he was nursed by a Wolf, found and taken away by Faustula, a Shepherd's Wife. The same unnatural nursing had Gyrrus, the same incredible Fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with Armour to Rhea, the Mother of Romulus, when he begat her with Child; and therein it seemeth to me that he might have two Purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the Daughter and Heir of his elder Brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdom; the other to satisfy his Appetite, because she was fair and goodly. For she being made a Nun of the Goddess Vesta, it was Death in her, by the Law, to break her Chastity. I also find in Faucher his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Merope, King of the Francs, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Faucher says, Let them believe it that list; Il le croira qui voudra: also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are Poetical Inventions: but to answer these Imaginations in general, it is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many Gods as there were Kings, or Passions of the Mind, or as there were of Vices and Vertues, then did many Women greatly born, cover such slips as they made, by professing to be forced by more than humane Power: so did Oenone consents to Paris, that he had been ravished by Apollo. And Anchises boasted that he had known Venus. But Rhea was made with Child by some Man of War, or other, and therefore called Mars, the God of Battle, according to the sense of the time. Oenone was overcome by a strong Wit, and by such a one as had those Properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Merope might fancy a Sea Captain to be gotten with young by such a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Evandus was called for her Beauty Venus, and was therefore the Child of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nursed by a Wolf, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Currians in those days were called Wolfs, que nunc (saith Halicarnassensis) beneficari vocula amica appellatur; which are now by an homier name called Friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his Life taken up into Heaven, or rather out of the World by his Father Mars, in a great Storm of Thunder and Lightning: so was it said that Aeneas vanished away by the River Nimicus: but thereof Livie also speaketh modestly; for he re-heareth the other Opinion, that the storm was the fury of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking up; and many Authors agree that there was an unnatural darkness, both at his Birth and at his Death, and that he might be slain by Thunder and Lightning, it is not unlikely. For the Emperor Aurelianus was slain with Lightning, so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slain with a Thunder-bolt: so Carus the Emperor (who succeeded Probus) whilst he lodged with his Army upon the River Tigris, was there slain with Lightning. But a Mars of the same kind might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a Man of War, and by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destiny followed most of the Roman Emperors) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus: who was but the seventh King after him: who when he had murdered his Father-in-Law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (saith he) Romulus himself died and was not buried. But let Halicarnassensis end this dispute: whose words are these. They (saith he) who draw nearest to the Truth, say that he was slain by his own Citizens; and that his Cruelty in punishment of Offenders, together with his Arrogancy, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported that both when his Mother was ravished, whether by Jove Mars, or by a God, the whole Body of the Sun was eclipsed, and all the Earth covered with darkness like unto Night, and that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the Birth and Death of Romulus: whose Life historiified by Plutarch, doth contain (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few Miles which had soon been forgotten, if the Roman Greatness built upon that Foundation, had not given it memory in all Ages following, even unto this day. A valiant Man he was, very strong of Body, patient of Travel, and temperate in Diet, as forbearing the use of Wine and Delicacies: but his raging Ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his Brother, and neglect revenge of the death of Tatius his Companion in the Kingdom, that he saw himself might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned seven and thirty years first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death single, till he was slain, as is already shewed: after which time the Sovereignty fell into the hands of Numa, a Man to him unknown, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Rome it self in her latter times hath somewhat resembled this King. For having long been sole Governours till Constantinople shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greek Emperor was crushed by foreign Enemies, and the Latines deploied of Imperial Power, the fell into the subjection of a Prelate, twining by degrees from the Sheep-hook to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excessive magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driven from Luxury to defensive Arms, and therein having been unfortunate, at length betakes her self again to the Cross and Staff.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the story of the times of King Aeneas, during whose Reign in Tenny, the Foundations of this famous City were laid.

CHAP.

Of EZEKIA, and his Contemporaries.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolemy's, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, and Mardocempadus, with the History of the Bible.

A's the first Year of Abaz, his Reign was confounded with the last of his Father Jotham, so was the latter end of his sixteen Years taken up in the three first of Ezekias his Son. This appears by the Reign of Holoz over Israël, which began in the twelfth of Abaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Abaz his fourteenth. But the third of Holoz was the first of Ezekia; so it follows, that Ezekia began to reign in his Fathers fourteenth year. Like enough it is, that the third year of Holoz, the same being the fourteenth of Abaz, was almost spent when Ezekia began, and so the fifteenth year of Abaz may have been concurrent, viz. the most part, with the first of Ezekia.

By supposing that Hofez began his Kingdom, when the twelfth year of Abaz was almost complete, some would find the means how to disjoin the first of Hefezia from the fifteenth of Abaz, placing him yet one year later, of which year, Abaz may perhaps have lived not many days. But seeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth years of Ezezia, may not be removed out of their places, it is vain labour to alter the first year.

tes, it is the fourteenth of Ezekia, Sennacherib invading Judea, and the Countries adjoining, loft his Angel, and miraculous froke from Heaven, fied home, and was flain. The year following it was that God added fifteen years to the Life of Ezekia, when he had already reigned fourteen of his nine and twenty: and the fame year was that Miracle feen of the Son's going back; of which wonder (as I hear) our Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for his skill in Altruometry, hath by calculation found the very day, which answered unto the twenty fifth of April, in the Julian year, being then Thursday. It is not necessary that any Works of Scultet; but surely to find a motion so irregular and miraculous, is a necessary that he produce fome Record of observation made at fuch a time. Howsoever it be, the fifteenth year of Ezekia is agreed upon; and therefore we may not alter the like Ages for that faying, which is usual in the like Ages, that Ahar lived with his Father, and Ezekia his Son reigned in his ftead, it doth not more prove that Ezekia reigned not with his Father, than the like faying doth infer the like at the death of Jehoshaphat, and fuccellion of Jehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Son to reign whilft his Father lived, we have already faid enough.

Of this godly King Ezekias, we find, that his very beginning testified his Devotion and Zeal. For whether it were so that his unfortunate and ungracious Father (who had out-worn his Reputation) gave way to his Sins proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather think) the first Year and first Month of his Reign, wherein Ezekias opened the doors of the Temple, were to be understood as the beginning of his Iole Government; we plainly find it so, have been his first work, that he opened the Doors of the House of the Lord, which Achaz had shut up, cleaned the City and Kingdom of the Idols, restored the Priests to their Offices, and Estates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had been for many years neglected, and brake down the brazen Serpent of Nefesh, because the People burnt Incense before it, and he called it Nabothian, which signifieth a lump of Brass. He did also celebrate the Pass-over with great Magnificence, inviting thereto the Israelites of all the Tribes, many of them were converts of those Tribes, that came up to Jerusalem to this Feast. But the general multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezekiel to scorn.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the Memorial of their deliverance out of the Ægyptian Servitude, fell into a new Servitude, out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezechie his Reign, Salmanassar the Son of Tiglath, the Son of Belochus, hearing that Holam King of Israel had practised with Son King of Ægypt, against him: invaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third year (after the Inhabitants had endured all sorts of Miferities) forced it and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Affria and Media: among whom Tobias and his Son of the same Name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nineve, in whose Scars and Places the Affryans feat Strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Ifraclites, as thofe of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Spernam, besides Babylonyans: whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

The latter Affyrin Kings, and the Perfians, which followed them, are the first, of whom we find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred Books. These therefore serve most apply to joyn the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better known, and described in course of History. True it is that of Cyrus and some other Perfians, we find in the Bible the same Names by which other Authors have recorded them: but of Phul and Salmassar, with other Affyrin, Chaldean Kings, diversity of Name hath bred question of the Persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures do speak of Salmassar, King of Affir, who reigned in the time of Abaz, and Ezekiab, Kings of Judab, and of Holse King of Israel, whom he carried into captivity: and whereas Ptolemy makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmassar and Nabonassar were one and the same Man. The like Reason all requireth, that it be shewed of Nebuchadnessar, that he was the same, whom Ptolemy calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholerm. hath well collected sufficient Proof from the exact Calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appears that between Nebuchassar and the birth of Cyrus, there passed seven hundred forty and five Years: as which distance of time the Reign of Samarmanassar was: One great proof hereof is this, which the late Bachmeiser allegeth out of Eranemus Reinboldus, in the Prænotitia Tables. Mardachab, King of Babylon (whom Prohmey, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moon, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Meredach, who sent Embassadors to Sassakab, King of Juda. So that if we reckon backwards to the difference of time, between Mardach and Salamannassar, we shall find it the same which is between Mardachab and Nebuchassar. Like wife Eusebius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samarita, to the devastation of Jerusalem, in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnessar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three Years: the self same distance of time is found in Prohmey, between Nabonnassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Prohmey seems to differ from this account, making Nebuchadnessar more ancient by an hundred and forty Years than the destruction of Jerusalem, we are to understand that he took Samarita in the eighth Year of his Reign; so that the seven foregoing Years added to these one hundred thirty and three make the accounts of the Scriptures fall even with that of Prohmey. Prohmey's computation is that from the first of Nabopolassar to the fifth of Nabonnassar, there passed one hundred twenty and five years. Now if we add to these one hundred twenty seven, the thirteen ending of Nebuchadnessar's Years, before the City and Temple were destroyed, we have the summe of one hundred and forty Years. In so plain a case more proofs are needless, though many are brought, of which this may serve for all, that Prohmey placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twenty and two Years after the first of Nebuchassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in account of times I hold more sure than the Authority of any History; and therefore I think it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematical observations do so thoroughly concurr.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest manifested, whereby he proved Baldan the Father of Mardochai, to have beened this Nabnessar, I will not spare to lofe a word, or to twin giving the Reader satisfaction herein. I am true, that the next observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomy Recorded, after the time of Nabnessar, were in the Reign of Mardochai; the second Year of whole Reign, is according to Ptolomy concurrent in part with the twenty seven of Nabnessar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second year of Mardochai, was from the beginning of Nabnessar twenty seven Years, fifteen Days, and eleven Hours: the account being from Nabnessar, beginning at high noon the first day of the Aegyptian Month Thoth, then ascending to the twenty fifth of February, and thence to the twelfth day five minutes before mid-night, or the twelfth day of March at Noon, when the first day thereof agreed with the new Year of February the first day of the Aegyptian Month. And thus it appears that the difference of time between the Kings Nabnessar and Mardochai, is not considerable, by Ptolomy, according to the Aegyptian Years. But how does this prove that Mardochai was Mardochai, was the Son of Nabnessar? yet, how doth it prove, that he was his next Successor or any way of his Lineage? It was enough to satisfy me, in this argument, that Scaliger him

Tell'd afterwards believe Mardochæus to have been rather the Nephew, than the Son of Saladur, or Nabonnassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Son; he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Country-man Livy hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Tornælius, who follows Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calvisius, who hath drawn into form of Chronology, that learned work, De Emerenditate Temporum, do hold up the 'same assertion, confounding Saladur with Nabonnassar: I have taken the pains to search, as far as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might prove the Kindred or Succession of these two. Yet cannot I find in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or adverse to Scaliger; and other good authority, I know none, in this business) any sentence more nearly proving the Succession of Merochab to Nabonnassar, than the place now last rehearsed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was Father to the other, than (that I may use a like example) the asseer Succession of William the Conqueror, to Henry the First, to have been the Son or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, we may safely go on with our account from Nabonnassar, taking him for Salmanassar; and not fearing that our Readers will be driven from our Book, when they find something in it, agreeing with Amnius, so far as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, Reigned in Babylon, and Affrica, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolemy are assigned to Telois, Nabonnassar, and Mardacompasus, and theret: no good History naming any others, that Reigned there in those Ages, and all Astronomical observations, fitly concurring with the years that are attributed to these, or numbered from them.

Of the danger and deliverance of Judæa from Sennacherib.

When Salmannasser was dead, and his Son Sennacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourth Year of Ezechias, he demanded of him such Tribute as was agreed on at such time as Tiglath, the Grand-Father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmannasser, invited by Shalmaneser King of Assyria, invaded Rezin King of Damascus, and delivered him from the dangerous War which Istael had undertaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgment when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, having (as it seems) a purpose to invade Egypt, sent one part of his Army to lie before Jerusalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerful Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his Peace, as he hoped; with thirty hundred Talents of Silver, and thirty Talents of Gold: wherewith he presented Sennacherib, now set down before Lachis in Judea; yet under the colour of better assurance, and to force the King of Judea to deliver Hostages, the Assyrian envied Jerusalem with a gross Army, and having his Sword in his Hand, thought it the fittest time to write his own Conditions.

Ezechias directed his three greatest Counsellors, to parly with Rabfakes, over the Wall, and to receive his demands : who used three principal arguments to perswade the people, to yield themselves to his Master Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretary, sent by Ezechias desired Rabfakes to speak unto them in the Syrian Tongue, and not in the Jewish, yet be with a more loud voice directed his speech to the multitude titude in their own Language. And for the first, he made them know, 1. that if they continued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a short time, be enforced to eat their own Dung, and drink their own Urine: Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Jews had hoped for Succour, and compared him to a broken Staff, on which who-soever leaneth pierceth his own hand: Thirdly, that the Gods who should help them, Ezecchias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brazen Serpent, which had been preserved ever since Moses's time; and whilal he had them remember the Gods of other Nations: now, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and thrown down; and for God himself, in whom they trusted, he perswaded them by no means to rely on him; for they would deceive them. But finding the people silent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while when he had understood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerful Army, he himself left the Assyrian forces in charge to others, and sought Sennacherib at Libna in Judaea, either to inform him of their resolution in Jerusalem, or to confer with him concerning the Army of Terabach the Arabian. Soon upon this there came Letters from Sennacherib to Ezecchias, whom he partly advised, and partly threatened to submit himself: using the same Blaphemous outrage against the all-powerful God, as before. But Ezecchias, sending those Counsellors to the Prophet Elisha, which had lately been sent to Rabfacc, received from him comfort, and assurance, that this Heathen Idolater should not prevail; against whom the King also beseought aid from Almighty God, repeating the most insolent and Blaphemous parts of Sennacherib's Letter, before the Altar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true, That the King of Ashur had destroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had put fire on their Gods; for they were no Gods, but the work of Mens hands, even Wood and Stone, &c.

The reason that moved Sennacherib to desire to possess himself in halfe of Jerusalem, was that he might thereunto have retreated his Army, which was departed, as it seemeth from the Siege of Pelisium in Egypt, for fear of Terabach: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprize (which in these Books of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speak but of the Affairs of Jews in effect) yet the ancient Berofus, and out of him, Josephus, and S. Hieron, together with Herodotus, remember it as follows. Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia and Assyria: which he might justly do, because Tigris his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Fekch King of Israel: as Gilkad over Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petrea adjoining: the same Herodotus also maketh Sargon King of Egypt, to be Vulcan's Priest, and reporteth that the reason of Sennacherib's return from Pelisium in Egypt, which he also beseiged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in funder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoiled the rest of their Weapons of that kind, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Terabach, remembered by Josephus, and Berofus, was the more urgent. S. Hieron upon the seven and thirtieth of Ely, out of the same Berofus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Josephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his words lie, reports Sennacherib's retreat in these words. Pugnavit autem Sennacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Egyptios, & obsedit Pelisium, tanquam extrinsecus aggeribus, ubi ca-piende, venisse Taracham Regem Ethiopiam in auxilium, & una nocte iuxta Jerusalem centum viginti quatuor milia exercitus Assyriorum pestilentia corripuit morali Herodotus: & plenissime Berofus Chaldaeus Terabachem indicat quorum fides de propriis libris petenda est. That Sennacherib King of the Assyrians fought against the Egyptians, and Beseiged Pelisium, and that when his Armies were built for the taking of the City, & Terabach King of the Ethiopians came to help them, and that in one night near Jerusalem one hundred eighty five thousand of the Assyrian Army perished by Pestilence, by these things (saith Hieron) * Herodotus reports: and more at large Berofus * A Writer of Chaldean Story, whose credit is to be in part taken from their own Books. Out of Ely it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Army was in this manner. Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with Thunder and Shaking, and there shall be a great noise, a Whirlwind and a Tempest, and a flame of devouring Fire. But Josephus hath it more largely out of the same Berofus, an authority (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not not of the to be omitted, Sennacheribus autem ab Egyptiaco bello revertens, ostendit ibi exercitum, quem suo Rabfacc Imperio reliquerat peste Divinitus immixta delictum, prima nocte postea quam Urbem oppugnare cepisset, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis, centum viginti quatuor milibus Militum, qua clade territus, & de reliquis copijs sollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regem que Ninus dicitur. Ubi paulo post per insidias Seniorum, & filius suus, Adramelech, & Sennacherib, citam amissi: occisus in ipso Sennacherib Templo quod dicitur Arasch; quem precipuo cultu dignabatur: quibus ob patricidium a popularibus pulsus & in Armeniam fugientibus, Asarcolus minor filius in Regnum successit. Sennacherib (saith Josephus) re- he was turning from the Egyptian War, found there his Army, which he had left under the Command of Rabfaccs, destroyed by a Pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begun to assault the Town: one hundred fourscore and five thousand of the Soldiers being consumed: with these Chiefs, and Colonels. With which destruction being terrified, and without afraid what might come to the rest of his Army, he made great marches into his Kingdom, to his Royal City, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the Treason of two of the Elders of his Sons, Adramelech and Sennacherib or Sennacher, he lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Araceus, or Neftroch: whom he especially worshipped. These his Sons being for their Parricide charged away by the people: and flying into Armenia, Asarcolus his younger Son succeeded in the Kingdom. Who in the beginning of his Reign sent new Troops out of Assyria and Samaria, to fortifie the Colony therein planted by his Grand-father Salmannassar. What this Mefoch was, it is uncertain: Hieron in his Hebrew Traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certain, that Venus Urania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Jupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus witness. Many fancies there are, of what cause his Son had to murder him; but the most likely is, that he had formerly disinherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Asarbadon. Tobit tells us, That it was fifty five years after Sennacherib's return, ere he was murdered by his Sons; during which time he flew, great numbers of the Israelites in Ninive, till the most just God turned the Sword against his own Breast.

Of Ezecchias his Sickness and Recovery; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

Jes. 39.

Ez. 40.

After this marvellous Delivery, Ezecchias sickened, and was told by Iffiah, that he must die: but after he had besought God with Tears for his Delivery, Iffiah as he was going from him returned again, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recovery after three days, and a prolongation of his life for fifteen Years. But Ezecchias somewhat doubtful of this exceeding Grace, praeit a sign to confirm him: whereupon, at the Prayer of Iffiah, the shadow of the Sun cast it self the contrary way, and went back ten Degrees, upon the Dial of Achaz. The cause that moved Ezecchias to lament (saith Saint Hieron) was, because he had as yet no Son, and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of David, or at least of his Seed. His dislike seemeth to be the Pestilence, by the Medicin given him by the Prophet, to wit, a mass of Figs, laid to the Borch or Sore.

This wonder when the Wife Men of Chaldaea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that House, he sent to Ezecchias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezecchias shewed him all the Treasure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdom: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Iffiah, who told him; The days are at hand, that all that is in thine House, and whatsoever thy Fathers have laid up in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. It may seem strange, how Ezecchias should have got any Treasure worth the shewing: for Sennacherib had robbed him of all, the Year before. But the spoil of the same Sennacherib's Camp repaid all with advantage, and made Ezecchias richer upon the suddain than ever he had been: which unexpected wealth was strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezecchias had rest, and spending without noise that addition which God had made unto his life, he died, having Reigned nine and twenty Years. One only offensive War he made, which was against the Philistines, with good success. Among his other Acts (shortly remembered in Ecclesiasticus) he devised to bring Water to Jerusalem.

In two respects they say that he offended God: the one, that he rejoiced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his Enemy; the other, that he so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to shew them to Strangers. But the reason which moved Ezecchias (speaking humanly) to entertain the Embassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recovery of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the House of Sennacherib, his fearful Enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander, or Lieutenant under Sennacherib in Babylon, usurped that State himself, in the last year of that King, and held it by strong hand against his Son Asarbadon; who was not only simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his Brothers. This advantage Merodach espied, and remembering, that their Ancestor Phil Beluchus had set his own Master Sardapanus besides the Cushion, thought it as lawful for himself to take the opportunity which this Kings weakness did offer, as it had been for Beluchus to make use of the others wickedness: and so, finding himself beloved of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerful, he did put the matter to hazard, and prevailed. The alteration of this History is made by the same arguments that were used in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phil Beluchus; which I will not here again rehearse. So of this new Race, which cut asunder the Line of Ninus, there were only five Kings.

But so far as much as the last year of Salmannassar was also the first of Sennacherib his Son, we reckon the time, wherein the House of Phil held the Assyrian Kingdom, to have been an hundred and one Years; of which, the last five and twenty were spent with Ezecchias, under Salmannassars, Sennacherib, and Asarbadon.

§. IV.

The Kings that were in Media during the Reign of Ezekia: Of the difference found between sundry Authors, in rehearsing the Median Kings. Other Contemporaries of Ezekia: of Candaneus, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercules.

IN the time of Ezekia, Medius, and after him Cardaceus, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that variety of names, by which these Kings were called in several Histories, hath caused them to seem more than indeed they were; or whether the Sons Reigning with the Fathers, have caused not only the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they governed Media, to exceed the due proportion: or whether the Copies themselves, of Ctesias and Ammian his Metaphrases, have been faulty, as neither of these two Authors is over-highly commended of truthfulness: so it is, that the names, number, and length of Reign, are all very diversly reported of these Median Kings, that followed Arbaces: Therefore it need not seem strange, that I reckon Medius and Cardaceus as Contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those Writers that vary from Eusebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will only here set down the Roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as sundry Authors have delivered it.

Ammian his Metaphrases orders them and their Reigns thus.

Mercator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But so far as it seems to me an impossible matter, to attain unto the truth of these forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Ctesibus and Metaphanes, I will lay the burthen upon Eusebius, who lived in an Age better furnished than ours, with Books of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medius and Cardicus, are found in Eusebius; for whether Cardicus were Diodorus his Arbians; I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, Reigned in this order.

These names, and this course of Succession I retain; but add unto these, Cyaxares the Son of Ahyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting down the length of a Kings Reign, otherwise than Eusebius hath it: of which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twenty nine Years of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four first that were chosen Governors of Athen: for ten Years; that is of Charops, Asmetes, Elidicus, and Hippotes. Touching the first of these I hear nothing, save that Rome was built in his first year; of which perhaps himself did not hear. Of the second and third I find only the names. The fourth made himself known by a strange example of justice, or rather of cruelty, that he shewed upon his own Daughter. For he finding that she had offended in unchastity, caused her to be locked up with an Horse, giving to neither of them any Food: so that the Horse constrained by hunger, devoured the unhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and Founder of that City Romulus, did Reign both before, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King, ruled in the same Age.

This Region was first called Mæonia. Lydis the Son of Arys reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we believe such authority as we find. This Kingdom was afterward by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred upon Argon, who came of Aleus the Son of Hercules by Taranda, a bond-woman. The race of these Heraclids continued Reigning fifty five Years (in which two and twenty Generations passed) the Son continually succeeding the Father. Candaules the Son of Arsifus was the last of this Race, who doated so much upon the Beauty of his own Wife, that he could not be content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges, the Son of Dasylias, to behold her naked Body; and placed the unwilling Man secretly in her Chamber, where he might see her preparing to bedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queen perceived Gyges at his going forth, and understanding the matter, took it in such high disdain, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with Treason. So Gyges, being brought again into the same Chamber by the Queen, slew Candaules; and was rewarded not only with his wife, but with the Kingdom of Lydia. He Reigned thirty eight Years, beginning in the last of Ezekia, one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his Son Ardis Reigned nine and forty Years; then Sadyattes, twelve; Halyattes, fifty seven; and finally Croesus, the Son of Halyattes, fourteen years: who lost the Kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Perfia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Croesus his Progenitor dispossessed, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which governed several Countries very long; as in Asia, the Myrians; in Greece, the Lacedæmonians, Messenians, Rhodians, Corinthians, and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians; as like-wise from the Corinthians, the Syracusan; besides many great and famous, though private, Families.

But of the Heraclids that Reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled my self to take notice in the times of their several Reigns: for little is found of them, beside the bare names, and the folly of this last King Candaules.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, between the deliverance of Israel from thence, and the Reign of Ezekia in Juda, when Egypt and Juda made a League against the Assyrians.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in History, are like to have belonged only to Viceroy. An example proving this out of William of Tyre his History of the Holy War.

THE emulation and quarrels arising in these times, between the mighty Kingdoms of Egypt and Assyria, do require our pains, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and setting down briefly the state of that Country, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the mastery. Of Cham, the Son of Noah, who first planted that Country, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, until the Israelites were thence delivered, more hath been said already than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to fail in such conjectures. That which I have delivered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here again help me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to have reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroy or Stewards, such as Isoph was, and such as were the Soldans in later ages. Therefore, I will not only forbear to seek after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned up, from the mouths of Egyptian Priests, delivering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will save the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the years of their Reigns, and other circumstances, proving them to have been Kings in deed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seem before hand, to lay an imaginary ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amiss, to give unto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of History doth afford. First therefore, we ought not to believe those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests have reckoned up, to magnify their Antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham, our Saviour Christ was removed only forty two descents, which makes it evident, that in far shorter time, namely before the Perfian Empire, there could not have passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, have reigned longer than forty years. It follows that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings, in some even proportion, to those which did bear rule in other Countries. As for the rest, whose names we find scattered here and there; any Man that will take the pains to read the nineteenth Book of the Holy War, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily persuade himself, that it is not hard to find names enough, of such as might be thought to have reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroy. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose, for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselves with turning over many Authors.

When Elbadecb the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerful and a subtle Man, made himself Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministered matter of quarrel to Almarick King of Jerusalem; and sustained, with little loss, an Invasion, which Almarick made upon Egypt. Hereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his party good against him, if he could get any Forces wherewith to enter Egypt. Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aid, who sends an Army of his Turks, under the command of Syracou, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victory was Dargan's, but he enjoyed it not: for in few days after, he was slain by Treason, whereby Sanar did recover his Dignity: which to establish he flew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could find in the great City of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elbadecb gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the Administration of the Kingdom, whilst he might have the profit of it, and e joy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would think) do nearly touch the Caliph himself. Syracou with his Turks, whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be incited there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They seize upon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortify, and there attend the arrival of more Company from Damasco, for the Conquest of all Egypt. The Soldan perceives their intent, and finds himself not strong enough to expel them; much less to repel the Turkish Army, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Almarick of Jerusalem, whom with large promises, he gets to bring him aid, and to drive out the Turks. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph hears nothing, or not so much, as should make him look to the playing of his own game.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elbadecb particularly, in his own Title. Syracou, Captain of the Turks, that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was appointed to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as Heir to Mahomet, that false Prophet, the Sovereignty over all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weakness of the Egyptian, with his own ability of doing service in those parts, offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismatical Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Western parts, under the subjection of the Byzantinian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Eastern Provinces are up in Arms; and Syracou, with a mighty power, defendeth into Egypt. The noise of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almarick, that with all his Forces he hasteth into Egypt: well knowing how nearly it concerned him and his Kingdom of Jerusalem, to keep the Saracens from joyning all under one head. Sauar the Sultan perceiving the faithful care of the Christians his Friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himself in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drove the Enemies out of the Country. But this Victory was not so soon gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet seems to know nothing. May we not think him to have been King in Title only, who meddled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose help, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King Almarick, upon condition, that he should abide by it. He prometh a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Pension) which the Kings of Jerusalem should receive out of Egypt, for this bechevalous assistance. But the Christians understanding that the Soldan (how much soever he took upon him) was subject to an higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance, with any other than the Caliph himself. Hereupon Hugh Earl of Cesarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent unto Eldadech, to ratifie the Covenants. Now shall we see the greatness of the Caliph and his Estate.

These Embassadors were conveyed by the Soldan to Cairo; where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troops of Soldiers. The first entrance was through dark Porches, and were kept by many armed Bands of Extrangers, which, with all diligence, did reverence unto the Soldan, as he passed along. Through these freights the Wardens led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beauty and riches, that they could not retain the gravity of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their Eyes. For there they saw goodly marble Pillars, gilded Beams, all wrought over with Embossed works, curious Pavements, Fifty-ponds of Marble with clear Waters, and many sorts of strange Birds, unknown in these parts of the World, as coming perhaps from the East-Indies, which then were undiscovered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuchs conveyed them into other Courts within these; as far exceeding the former, as the former did surpass ordinary Houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse how, the further they entered, the more high state they found, and cause of marvel; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was never held a vain Author. Finally, they were brought into the Caliph's own Lodgings, which were yet more stately, and better guarded, where entering the Presence, the Soldan, having twice prostrated himself, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he were about his Neck, and throw himself on the Ground, before the Curtain, behind which the Caliph sat. Presently the Traverse, wrought with Gold and Pearls, was opened, and the Caliph himself discovered, sitting with great Majesty on a Throne of Gold, having very few of his most inward Servants and Eunuchs about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters Feet, he briefly told the cause of his coming, the danger wherein the Land stood, and the offers that he had made unto King Almarick, desiring the Caliph himself to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would thoroughly perform all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would have him to give his hand upon the bargain; which the Egyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatness concended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earl of Cesarea saw that the Caliph gave his hand, neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seeks no holes to hide itself; Princes, that will hold Covenant, must deal openly, nakedly, and sincerely; Give us therefore your bare hand, if you mean that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargains with your Glove. Much ado there was about this: for it seemed against the Majesty of such a Prince to yield so far. But, when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling cheer (though to the great grief of his Servants) he vouchsafed to let the Earl take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the Covenants, word by word, as the Earl spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatness.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great Estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himself with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his Neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the mean season, using all Royal power; making War and Peace, entertaining and expelling Armies of Strangers; yea, making the Land of Egypt tributary to a Foreign Prince. What greater Authority was given to Joseph, when Pharaoh said unto him, Thou shalt be over mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the King's house will I be above thee; Behold, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt.

I do not commend this form of Government; neither can I approve the conjecture of mine Avar, that where he thinks, that the Egyptians, ever since Joseph's time, have felt the burthen of that servitude, which he brought upon them, when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharaoh. Herein I find his judgment good; that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient Customs, practised by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomaeus Lagi, and his Son Philadelphus, Founder and Establisher of that Race) were given, all of them, wholly to please their own Appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdom to Women, Eunuchs, and other Ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Country afforded, were indeed sufficient, to invite the Kings thereof unto a voluptuous life; and the awful regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gave them security, whereby they might the better trust their Officers, with so ample Commission. But of this matter I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroy Governing Egypt, is set down by Moses, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who lived in the same age; was, in few years after, Chancellor of the Kingdom of Jerusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earl of Cesarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that we be not carried away with a vain opinion, to believe that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians, have honoured with that Title; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we find by circumstance, likely to have reigned in that Country; after whom it follows that we should make enquiry.

§. I.

Of Acherres; whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Olympandys. Of Olympandys and his Tomb.

IN this Business I hold it vain to be too curious. For who can hope to attain to the perfect knowledge of the Truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius from both of them, and late Writers, that have sought to gather the Truth out of these and others, find no one with whom they can agree. In this case Ammus would do good service, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others do either say nothing, or that which may justly be suspected. I will therefore hold myself contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in laying somewhat of Ofiris, Isty, Orus, and those Antiquities removed so far out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius, have not been silent, and that Reineccius hath taken pains, to range into some good order the Names that are extant in these, or found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, unto the Reign of Thauris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Protem) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set down the same which are found in Eusebius, and give to every one the same length of Reign.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded unto Chembres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seems to Reineccius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Olympandys, from whom Uchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Tismus (as Reineccius conjectures) was the great Olympandys; or else that this Acherres was Uchoreus: for the distance between them was more than eight Generations. Mercator judgeth Olympandys to have been the Husband of Acherres, Orus the second his Daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited he Josephus) doth omit his Name, and insert his Wives, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his Wives Right. As for Uchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this Man: for he takes Ogdon, not to signify in this place of Diodorus (as that Greek word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian Name, belonging also to Uchoreus, who might have had two Names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex my Brains in the unprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodorus hath found of this Olympandys, was wrought upon his Monument; the most thereof in figures, which I think the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Army, with the siege of a Town, the captivity of the People, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians said to denote the Conquest of Babylon made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly piece of Work, which Diodorus so particularly describes, to have been erected for a common place of Burial, to the ancient Kings and Queens of Egypt, and to their Vice-Roy; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as every one to have his own particular Monument, striving therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many Statues, therein placed, by the Wars, the Judgment-Seat, the receiving of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the account of Revenues, and plenty of all Cattel and Food; all which were there curiously wrought; shewing the several Offices of a Governor. On the Tomb of Olympandys was this inscription. I am Olympandys King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceed some of my Works. Let them, that hope to exceed his Works, Labour to know what he was. But since by those words, Or where I lie, it should seem that he lay not there interred, we may lawfully suspect that it was Joseph whose Body was preserved among the Hebrews, to be buried in the Land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who out-lived him, erect in Honour of his high Deeds, among the Royal Sepulchres. To which purpose, the plenty of Cattel, and all manner of Viands, had good reference. The Name Olympandys doth not hinder this conjecture; seeing Joseph had one new Name given to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the Dream, and might, upon further occasions, have another, to his increase of Honour. As for that Title, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Bagherbe, as the Turkish Pap-faes are called, that is, Great above the Great.

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, between the times of Joseph and Acherres, (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Vice-Roy Joseph was) yet will I hereby seek, neither to fortify mine own conjecture, as touching Joseph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres his being Uchoreus. For it might well be, that Memphis was built by some fifth King, as was Gebor, Lieutenant unto Caliph Elcain, who had John Leo going to his Masters wife, conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great City of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistress, though he himself were a Dalmatian Slave.

§. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameffes, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that bears his Name.

WHEN Acherres had reigned eight years, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdom fifteen years: then reigned Armeus five years, and after him Rameffes, threecore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameffes is that History understood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greeks, under the Names of Danaus and Egyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his Brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdom of Argos; that he had fifty Daughters, whom upon seeming reconciliation, he gave in Marriage to his Brother's fifty Sons, but commanded every one of them to kill her Husband the first Night; that only Hypermetra, one of his Daughters, did save her Husband Lycus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this Fact, all the bloody Sisters, when they died, were enjoined this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking Vessel with Water.

The Reign of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; and Rameffes, Egyptus; is more than Reineccius believes: he rather takes Armeus to have been Myris, or Moria, who caused the great Lake to be made which bears his Name. For my own part, as I can easily be-cessors, unto the beginning of Sesac: by which account, the first year of Sesac is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Salomon's Reign, and the twenty-sixth of Sesac with the fifth of Rehoboam: wherein Sesac spoiled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacrilege no longer, than Joa the Israhelites, and Croesus the Roman did; who, after him, spoiled the Temple of Jerusalem.

To fill up the time between Sesac and Necho, I have rather taken those Kings that I find in the Greek Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of those that are delivered by Eusebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere save only of Bocchoris, who is remembered by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appear to have been a King. Hereunto I may add, that the Succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by Ethiopian, which got the Kingdom often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appears by the Prophet Elijah, that the Counsellors of Pharaoh did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that House, inasmuch, that they said of Pharaoh, 12. 19. 11. I am the Son of the Wife, I am the Son of the ancient King.

But that which overthrows the reckoning of Eusebius, is, the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to see how the Reigns of Josiah and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed marries all, the Reign of Josiah being misplaced. This Error grows from his omitting, to compare the Reigns of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion, Joram, King of Israel, is made to reign three years after Ahabaz of Juda; Samaria is taken by Salmanassar before Hezekiah was King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings, have their beginnings placed in some other year of their collateral than the Scriptures have determined.

§. VI.

Of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings reigned by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned between the times of Rehoboam and Ezekia.

Following therefore the Greek Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chemis, first in the rank of those that were Kings after Sesac. He reigned fifty years, and built the greatest of the three Pyramids, which was accounted one of this Worlds Wonders. The Pyramid hath his Name from the Shape, in that it resembleth a flame of Fire, growing from the bottom upwards, narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being four-square, had a Base of seven acres every way, and was above six acres high. It was of a very hard and durable Stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand years, without complaining of any injury that it had suffered by Weather in so long a space. From the Reign of Chemmis, unto the age of Augustus Caesar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeed a thousand years, which gives the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramids, late Writers refuse, that they have seen them yet standing.

Diodore L. 1. After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his Brother; but doubtfully, and enclosing rather to the opinion, that his Son Chabres succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabres) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to have been Brethren; but the length of their Reigns may argue the latter to have been Son to the former: for Cheops reigned fifty years; Cephrenes fifty six. These were, as Chemmis had been, builders of Pyramids, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had over-laboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramids were ordained to be Tombs, for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to have cast out their Bodies; and to have called their Monuments by the Name of an Herdsman, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their Houses, and entitling a poor Fellow to their Works, did hold to be the casting out of their Bodies: otherwise it is hard to conceive, how it might be, that they, who had no power to avoid the like slavery laid upon them by the younger Brother, or Son, should have power or leisure to take such revenge upon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the Tale devised against Cheops his Daughters: that her Father, wanting Money, did prostitute her, and that the, getting of every Man that accompanied her, one Stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramid, that stood in the midst of the other three. Belike he was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery, for her sake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raising a Monument, with the superfluity of her Father's provisions.

Mycerinus, the Son of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father six years. He would have built as his foregoers did, but prevented by death, finished not what he had begun. The People thought him a good King, for that he did let open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatened him with a short Life of six years only, because of his devotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should have been afflicted an hundred and fifty years, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their part; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou live but six years. It is very strange, that the Gods should be offended with a King for his Piety; or that they should decree to make a Country impious, when the People were desirous to serve them; or that they having so decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter Destiny, and make the Ordinance of the Gods to fail in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian Gods. The true GOD was, doubtless, more offended with the reformation of such Idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knows, whether Chemmis did not learn somewhat at Jerusalem, in the last year of his Father Sesac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian Superstition? Sure it is that his Reign, and the Reigns of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happy, than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, revelled away both Days and Nights, as if by keeping Candles lighted, he had changed his Nights into Days, and so doubled the time appointed: a service more pleasing to the Devil, than the reformation of Idolatry did then seem, when it could speed no better. I find in Reimercius fifty years assigned to this King; which I verily believe to have been some error of the Print, though I find it not corrected among other such over-lights: for I know no Author that gives him so many years, and Reimercius himself takes notice of the Oracle, that threatened Mycerinus with a short Life, as is before showed.

Bocchoris is placed next unto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong Man of Body, and excelling his Predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by divers Authors, as one that loved Justice; and may be taken for that Banckyrus, whom Suida commends in that kind: Eusebius reckons four and forty years of his Reign.

After Bocchoris, one Sabacus an Ethiopian follows, in the Catalogue of Diodore, but certain ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchoris, hath Aphis; who made a sharp Law (as it was then held) against Debtors, that their dead Bodies should be in the Creditors disposition, till the debts were payed. This Aphis made a Pyramid of Brick, more costly and fair, in his own judgment, than any of those that the former Kings had raised.

Besides this Aphis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blind Man, before the Ethiopian. The Reigns of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Egyptians, to magnify their Antiquities, accounted between Bocchoris and him that followed them. But all this could make but six years; and so long doth Fimilicus, so long doth Reimercius hold, that these two Kings, between them both, did govern. If any Man would lengthen this time, holding it improbable, that the Reigns of two Kings should have been so soon spent; he may do it by taking some years from Sethon or Phameticus, and adding them to either of these: To add unto these, without subtracting from some other, would breed a manifest inconvenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his Reign, must have been in the fifth of Rehoboam; as also the last of Pharaoh Neco was the fourth of Jehoiakim, and the first of Neuchadnezzar. For mine own part I like it better to allow fix years only to these two Kings, than to lose the witness of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of Senacherib's War: at which time Sethon was King of Egypt. I will not therefore add years unto these obscure names; for by adding unto these Men three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Senacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Egyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great envy, to leave both Aphis and Anysis out of the Roll; which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet six years further, or more, (if the like abridgment shall be required of Phameticus his Reign) into the years of Rehoboam.

Of Sabacus the Ethiopian, who took the Kingdom from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fifty years. He was a merciful Prince, not punishing all capital offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour upon Malefactors; by whose toil he both got much Wealth into his own hands, letting out their service to hire, and performed many works, of more use than pomp, to the singular benefit of the Country. Zonaras calls this King Sus, the Scriptures call him o. Hofai, the last King of Israel, made a League with him against Salmanassar, little to his good; for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserve the Israelites from destruction.

It seems, that the encroaching power of the Assyrian, grew terrible to Egypt about these times; the Victories of Tiglath Phileassar, and Salmanassar, having eaten so far into Syria, in the Reign of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his days (for his Reign began in the fourth of Menaem) that Phul himself did make the first entrance into Palestina: This caused So to animate the half subdued People, against their Conquerors; but the help which he and his Successor gave them was so faint, that Senacherib's Embassage compared the Egyptian succour to a broken Staff of Reed. Sus indeed had Hofai found it, and such Ezekiah might have found it, had he not been supported by the stronger Staff of Him, that rules all Nations with a Rod of Iron. It appears by the words of Isaiah, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian Forces, for Chariot and Horse men; but this power, whatsoever it was, grew needless, within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it self, which So left unto Sethon his Successor, having now fulfilled the fifty years of his Reign. Herodotus and Diodore have both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Country, and willingly retired into Ethiopia, because it was often signified unto him in his Dreams, by the God which was worshipped at Thebes, that his Reign should be neither long nor prosperous, unless he slew all the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his Kingdom. Surely these Egyptian Gods were of a strange quality, that so ill rewarded their Servants, and invited Kings to do them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as Gods, when their chief Gods had the property of Dogs, which love their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should have feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I think that it might be some device, of the fearful old Man, who seeing his Realm in danger of an Invasion, fought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and withdrawing himself into Ethiopia, where he had been bred in his Youth. What if one should say, that the Ethiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this Man) raised an Army against Senacherib, when he meant to invade Egypt, within two or three years after? But I will not trouble my self with such enquiry. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus, was not indeed an Ethiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Elijah, who mentioned the Antiquity of Pharaoh's House) but only so furnished for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the Kingdom from Aphis, who was his opposite. The quiet and mild form of his Government; his holding the Kingdom so long without an Army; and many other circumstances argue no less. But whether finally he betook to a private life, or whether he forwent his Life and Kingdom at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and speak of Sethon his next Successor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembered by Herodotus, by a sure token of his having been King.

Of Sethon who reigned with Ezekia, and sided with him against Senacherib.

THE first year of Sethon's Reign falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fifth of Senacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdoms of Assyria and Egypt, being then engaged in a War, the issue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serve. The Assyrian had the better Men of War; but the Egyptian better provision of necessaries: the Assyrian more Subjects; the Egyptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered, half half Subjects of Affur, many that were Assyrian in heart, though Assyrian in outward show.

Of this last fort were Ezekia, and his People; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharaoh, to protect them against his own great Enemy, preferred the friendship of so near and mighty a Neighbour, before the service of a terrible, yet far removed King. But herein was great difference, between Ezekia and his Subjects: For the good King, fixing his especial confidence in God, held that course of policy, which he thought most likely to turn to the benefit of his Country: the Multitude of Judea, looking into the fair hopes which this Assyrian League promised, were puffed up with vain conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not need to fear any more of those injuries, which they had suffered by the Assyrians, and so became forgetful of God, taking counsel but not of him. The Prophet Efay complained much of this presumption; giving the People of Juda to understand, That the Assyrians were men, and not God, and their forces flesh, and not Spirit; that God himself should defend Israel upon repentance, and that Affur should fall by the sword, but not of man. As for the Assyrians (said the Prophet) they are vain, and they shall help in vain, their strength is to be still.

According to the Prophets words it came to pass. For in the Treaty of Confederacy that was held at Zaan, all manner of contentment and assurance was given to the Jews, by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports of Horfes and Chariots, that they did not look, (as Efay saith) unto the holy one of Israel, nor seek unto the Lord. But he yet is wifely.

After a while came Senacherib with his Army, and wakened them out of their Dreams; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as near as he was, did seem far off, being uneasy, when his help was most needful. It may seem that he purposed, rather to make Palestina than Assyria the Stage, whereon this great War should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Assyrians and Jews, weakening one another, should yield unto him a fair advantage over both. Yet he fought with money, for he sent Horfes and Camels laden with Treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Efay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit in deed; for (besides that it seems by the same place of Efay, that the rich Treasures miscarried, and fell into the Enemies hands before any help appeared from Thibacia) all the strong Cities of Juda were taken by Senacherib, except Lisba, Lachis, and Tersusalem it self, which were in force fortified, till the Sword of God, and not of man, defeated the Assyrian, who did go, for fear, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Ninive, where he was slain.

Concerning this expedition of Senacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it; That it was purposed against Assyria, where the Men of War, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to bear Arms in defence of him and the Country: that Sethon being Vulcan's Priest, benighted himself to his God, who by Dream promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with such as would follow him, (which were Crafts-men, Shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Palestina; and that a great multitude of Field-mice entering the Camp of Senacherib by Night, did devour the Bows, Quivers, and Straps of his Men's Armour, that they were fain the next Day to flee away into Assyria, finding themselves disarmed. In the same proof (saith Herodotus) the Statue of this King was set up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Snake in his hand, with this Inscription: Let him, that beholds me, serve God: Such was the relation of the Assyrian Priests, wherein how far they swerved from the Truth, being desirous to magnify their own King, it may easily be perceived. It seems that this Image of Sethon was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diadorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Jews was then well known to the World, whereof every Child could have told, how much falsehood had been mingled with the truth.

We find this History agreeable to the Scriptures, thus far forth: That Senacherib King of the Assyrians, and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peradventure some borders upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this age, made War upon Assyria, and was miraculously driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did unto his Priest; happy it was (if Sethon were a Priest) that he took his God now in so good a mood. For within three or four years before this, all the Priests in Assyria should have been slain, if a merciful King had not spared their lives, as it were half against the Gods Will. Therefore this last good turn was not enough to serve as an example, that might stir up the Assyrians to Piety, seeing that their Devotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I think, that this Image did represent Senacherib himself, and that the Mould in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Assyrian manner of expressing things) the shameful illue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Army, by means which came, no Man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed upon this ungodly King, was indeed a very good motive to Piety. But the Emblem, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being, perhaps the chief Temple in that Town where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a Fable; the Devil helping to change the Truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belye the Devil, I hold it very likely, that Sethon, finding himself in danger, did call upon his Gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most Devotion. But so had other of his Predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like Miracle? Surely the Jews (even such of them as most were given to Idolatry) would have been ashamed of the confidence which they reposed, in the Chariots of Assyria, because they were many, and Efay saith in the best-mend, because they were very strong, had it been told them, that Sethon, instead of sending those Horfe-men and Chariots, was beseeching Vulcan, to send him and them good luck, or else (for these also were Assyrian Gods) addressing his Prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoever it was, doubtless the Prophecy of Efay took effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor do them good, but shall be a shame, and also a reproach. Such is commonly the illue of humane wisdom, when resting secure upon provision that it self hath made, it will no longer seem to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to have been set down by Eufebius, under the name of Tarachus the Assyrian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the Reign of Sethon. These have well observed, that Tarachus the Assyrian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Assyria, but as a Friend to that Country, or at least an Enemy to Senacherib, in the War last spoken of: the Assyrians (as they are Englished) over which he reigned, being indeed Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose a right, that Eufebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they think, that this Tarachus or Tribulus, is placed in the room of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethon the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Assyrian (as he is called) began his Reign over Assyria, by Eufebius his account, after the death of Senacherib and of Ezekia, in the first year of Manasse King of Juda. Therefore he, or his years, have no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned; Eufebius peremptorily, citing no Author, nor alleging Reason for it, sets him down thirty three years; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not careful to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that Rule which I propound-

CHAP. XXVII.

OF MANASSES, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

The wickedness of MANASSES. His Imprisonment, Repentance, and Death.

MANASSES, the Son of Ezekia, forgetting the Piety of his Father, and the Prosperity which followed him, set up, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Devil was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himself esteemed the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, with all the host of Heaven, as Gods, and worshipped them: and of all his Acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sons for a Sacrifice to the Devil Moloch, or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnom, Ben-hinnom: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Devils.

He also gave himself to all kind of Witchcraft and Sorcery, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blood, as Jerusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reverent Prophet Efay (who was also of the King's race, and as the Jews affirm, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet near unto the Fountain of Silo to be fawn in funder, with a wooden Saw, in the eightieth year of his Life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeed are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eufebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captains of the Host of the Kings of Affur, which took Manasse, and put him in Fetters, and bound him in Chains, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twenty years as a Captive, and deposed of all Honour and Hope; yet to his hearty Repentance and continual Prayer, the God of infinite mercy had respect, and moved the Assyrian heart to deliver him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loved his Father Ezekia, was the easilier persuaded to restore Manasse to his Liberty and Estate. After which, when he was again established, remembering ed unto my self at the first; for measuring the Reigns of these Assyrian Kings. The years which passed from the fifth of Reboham, unto the fourth of Iehaiakim, I so divide among the Assyrians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferred upon him whose length of Reign is uncertain; that is upon this Sethon. By this account I find the thirty three years, that are set down by Eufebius, to agree very nearly, if not precisely, with the time of Sethon's Reign; therefore I conform my own Reckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one year less. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Plammaticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereunto the course of this History will shortly bring me; the Assyrian Affairs growing now to be entangled with the matters of Juda, to which it is meet that I return.

Of Troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The Reign of Plammaticus.

THAT the wickedness of King Manasse was the cause of the evil, which fell upon his Kingdom and Person, any Christian must needs believe: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled God's pleasure, upon respect born to his own ends) desirous of enlarging his Empire, to make attempt upon Juda. For the Kingdom of Assyria, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Juda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with civil dissention, and after two years, ill amended by a division of the Government between twelve Princes. After some good agreement between these, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their Colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himself absolute King of all. This Interregnum, or mere Anarchy, that was in Assyria, with the division of the Kingdom following it, is placed by Diadorus, who omitteth Sethon, between the Reigns of Sabacus, and Plammaticus; but Herodotus doth set the Assyrian, or twelve Governours, immediately before fore Psammis, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this dissention seems to have been the uncertainty of Title to that Kingdom (for that the Crown of Egypt passed by succession of Blood, I have often shewed, which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not settled, until one had obtained the Sovereignty.

These twelve Rulers governed fifteen years, in good feiring agreement, which to preserve, they made firmit Covenants and Alliances one with another, being jealous of their Estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this Token, that he should make a Drink-offering, in Vulcan's Temple, out of a Copper Goblet. Whilst this Unity lasted, they joyed together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built near unto the Lake of Mari; a Work so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beheld it, affirms) no words could give it commendation, answerable to the stateliness of the Work it self. I will not here set down that imperfect Description, which Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to say, that he preters it far before the Pyramids, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest Works in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to have been the Work of Mari, or Memis; a King which lived five Generations before Protes, that is, before the War of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dadalus took the Pattern of that which he made for Minos in Cret. Who this Mari or Memis was, I cannot tell. Reinceus takes him to have been Annemenes, who reigned immediately before Thoris. But this agrees not with Diodorus for Dadalus and Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reinceus, desiring to accommodate the fabulous Relations of Manethon, Cheremon, and others, that are found in Josephus, touching Amasis and his Children, to the Story of Amasis, and Ashanes the Aethiopian, mentioned by Diodorus; held it consequent, after he had confectured Manethon's Amasis, to be Diodorus's his Amasis, that Sethon should be Ashanes; and that Annemenes should be Mari. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture; the times which we now handle, are those, about which Reinceus hath erred in making search; Amasis was Ashanes; Ashanes was Sabacus; and Mari was one of these twelve Princes, to whom Herodotus gives the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Amasis the Aethiopian deposed Ashanes, Sabacus the Aethiopian deposed Ashanes, Ashanes governed well, and was mild in punishing Offenders; so likewise was Sabacus; Mari the next King. Amasis built this Labyrinth, and the next (saith Herodotus, whom Diodorus imits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same Work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to hear the Truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and difference of times wherein Diodorus believed the Priest, might be a part of the Egyptian Vanity, which was familiar with them; in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their Antiquities. Here I might add, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other Circumstances remembered by Herodotus, in speaking of this Building, do help to prove, that it was the work of these great Princes. But I haften to their end.

At a solemn Feast in Vulcan's Temple, when they were to make their Drink-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himself, brought forth no more than eleven Cups. Hereupon Psammis, who standing left, had not a Cup, took off his breast Helmet, and therewith supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him upon self purpose, or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but, being jealous of their Estate, they banished him into the marsh Countries by the Sea-side. This Oracle, and the event, is held by Diodorus as a Fable, which I believe to have been none other: In the rest Herodotus and Diodorus agree, saying, that Psammis hired Souldiers out of Caria and Ionis, by whose aid he vanquished his Companions, and made himself sole King.

The years of his Reign, according to Herodotus, were fifty four; according to Eusebius, forty four; Mercator, to reconcile these two, gives forty four years to his single Reign, and ten to his Ruling, jointly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeed, he that was admitted, being a Man grown (for he cannot in reason be supposed to have been then a young fellow) into the number of the twelve Governours, must be thought to have lived unto extreme old Age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threecore and nine years. I therefore yield rather to Eusebius; but will not adventure to cut five years from the Antiquities: though peradventure Psammis was not at first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by Election, or as next of Blood) into the place of some Prince that died, and was ten years Companion in that Government.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this Reckoning. The years of these Egyptians, as we find them set down, are more by one, than serve to fill up the time, between the fifth of Reheboam, and the fourth of Jehoiakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one year from Sethon's Reign; that was of uncertain length; or else (which I had rather do; because Psammis may have followed better Authority than I know, or then himself alleged, in giving to Sethon a time so nearly agreeing with the Truth) we must confound the last year of one Reign, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no Man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set down in Chronological Tables, reigned precisely so many years as are ascribed unto them, without any Fractions: it is enough to think, that the surplussage of one Man's time, supplied the defect of another. Wherefore I confound the last year of those fifteen, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the first of Psammis; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himself Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt, who entertained any Strait Amity with the Greeks; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionis, and Arabia, to whom he gave large Rewards and Possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left Wing of his Army, whilst his Mercenaries held the right Wing, (which was the more honourable place) in an Expedition that he made into Syria. Upon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers; to the number of two hundred thousand, forsook their natural Country of Egypt, and went into Aethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by King Messages; nor by the King himself, who over-took them on the way; but when he told them of their Country, their Wives, and Children, they answered that their their Weapons should get them a Country, and that Nature had enabled them to get other Wives and Children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought up in such sort as they might not hear any word spoken; by which means, he hoped to find out, what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that Nature would teach the Children to speak that Language, which Men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the Children cried, Becum, Tecum, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian Tongue, served greatly to magnifie the Phrygian Antiquity. Geopius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low Dutch; in which the word Becker, signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of Bread. He that will turn over any part of Geopius his Works, may find enough of this kind, to persuade a willing Man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs, used none other Tongue than the Low Dutch, before the confusion of Languages at Babel; the Name it self of Babel, being also Dutch, and given by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble, and talk, one knew not what.

But I will not insist upon all that is written of Psammis. The most remarkable of his Acts was the Siege of Acatus in Palestina, about which he spent nine and twenty years. Never have we heard (saith Herodotus) that any City endured so long a Siege as this; yet Psammis carried it at the last. This Town of Acatus had been won by Tertan, a Captain of Sennacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, relieved, but in vain, by the Babylonians, which made it hold out so well.

§. III.

What reference these Egyptian Matters might have to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manasses. In what part of his Reign Manasses was taken Prisoner.

Where it certainly known, in what year of his Reign Manasses was taken Prisoner, and how long it was before he obtained Liberty; I think we should find these Egyptian Troubles to have been no small occasion, both of his Captivity and Enlargement: God so disposing of humane Actions, that even they, who intended only their own business, fulfilled only his high Pleasure. For either the Civil Wars in Egypt that followed upon the death of Sethon; or the renting of the Kingdom, as it were into twelve pieces, or the War between Psammis and his Collegues, or the Expedition of Psammis into Syria, and the Siege of Acatus might minister unto the Babylonians, either such cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessity of sending an Army unto those parts, to defend his own, as would greatly tempt him, to make sure work with the King of Juda. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the delivery of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Josephus hath it) by subtilty, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, win his Country, but only waite it. So that the Jews, having learned wit, by the ill success of their folly, in redeeming Manasses, were like to be more circumspect, in making their Bargain upon such another Accident: and the Babylonians (to whom the Egyptian Matters presented more weighty Arguments of Hope and Fear, than the little Kingdom of Juda could afford,) had no reason, to spend his Forces in pursuing a small Conquest, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he should compel his mightiest Enemies to come to some good Agreement; when by quitting his present advantage over the Jews, he might make his way the fairer into Egypt.

Now concerning the year of Manasses his Reign, wherein he was taken Prisoner, or concerning his Captivity it self, how long it lasted; the Scriptures are silent, and Josephus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Tornilius three Opinions, the one of Belarmine, who thinks that Manasses was taken in the fifth year of his Reign; the other of the Author of the greater Adversus Coronologiam, who affirms, that it was in his twelfth year; the third, of Rabbi Kimbi upon Ezekiel, who saith, that he was forty years an Idolater, and lived fifteen years after his Repentance. The first of these Conjectures is upheld by Tornilius, who rejects the second, as more improbable, and condemns the third as most false. Yet the Reasons alleged by Tornilius in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather prove him to favour the Cardinal, as far as he may, (for where need requires, he doth freely dissent from him) than to have used his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gave his judgment. Two Arguments he brings to maintain the Opinion of Belarmine: the one, that Amnon the Son of Manasses, is said by Josephus, to have followed the Works of his Father's Youth; the other, that had Manasses grown old in his sins, it is not like that he should have continued, as he did, in his amendment unto the end of his life. Touching the former of these Arguments, I see no reason, why the Sins of Manasses, might not be distinguished from his Repentance in his old Age, by calling them Works of his Youth, which appeared when he was twelve years old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimbi) until he was but fifteen years from death. Touching the second; however it be a fearful thing, to cast off unto the last those good motions unto Repentance, which we know not whether ever God will offer unto us again; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the Sins, which are not forsaken before the age of two and fifty years, shall be punished with final impency. But against these two Collections of Tornilius, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, That Manasses continued longer in this wickedness, than Belarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimbi hath affirmed. In the second Book of Kings, the evil which Manasses did is remembered at large, and his repentance utterly omitted; so that his amendment may seem to have taken up no great part of his Life, the story of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter. Concerning the rest of the Acts of Manasses, and all that he did, and his sin that he sinned, are they not written in the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda. The other place is in the four and twentieth Chapter of the same Book, where in rehearsing the Calamities, with which that Nation was punished in the time of Jehoiakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasses, it is said; Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this upon Juda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the sins of Manasse, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he shed (for he shed Jerusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Whole considers well these places, may find small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was earlier than fifteen years before his death, or most probable, That when he was twenty seven years old, he repented, and becoming a new Man, lived in the fear of God forty years after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two years of civil dissension in Aegypt, fourteen or fifteen years following, wherein that Kingdom was weakened, by partition of the Sovereignty; the War of Phamias against his Associates; and four and twenty years, of the nine and twenty, wherein the King of Assus continued, being all within the time of Manasse, did leave no one part of his Reign (after the first fifteen years) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonians, whose Men of War had continual occasions of visiting his Country. All which I will add hereto is this; that the fifteenth of Manasse, was the last year of Seton in Aegypt, and the one and thirtieth of Mordach his Reign, or (accounting from the death of Abraham) the twentieth: The seven and twentieth of Manasse was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and fortieth of Mordach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Phamias, and the fifth of Nabulassar, the Son of Mordach in Babylon: but which of these was the year of imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbear to give mine opinion on, lest I should thereby seem to draw all matters over violently to mine own computation.

This was the first great mastery that the Babylonians had of the Kingdom of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmassar, yet Ezekias never paid it. True it is, that he hoped to stay Sennacherib's Enterprize against him, by presenting him with three hundred Talents of Silver, and thirty of Gold, besides the Plate which covered the doors and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasse being pressed with greater Necessity, could refuse no tolerable Conditions, that the Babylonians would impose upon him; among which it seems, that this was one, (which was indeed a point of Servitude) that he might not hold Peace with the Aegyptians, whilst they were Enemies to Babylon. This appears not only by his fortifying with Men of War all the strong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather against Phamias, whose Party he had forsaken, than against the Babylonians, with whom he had thenceforth no more Controversie) but likewise by that opposition, which Josias made afterwards to Pharaoh Neco, in favour of Nabulassar, which had been against all Reason and Policy, if it had not been his Duty by Covenant. Of this I will speak more in convenient place.

Of the first and second Meflian Wars, which were in the Reigns of Ezekias, and Manasse Kings of Juda.

NO concerning such Actions as were performed abroad in the World, about these times of Manasse, the most remarkable were the Meflian Wars; which happening in this Age, and being the greatest Action performed in Greece, between the Trojan and Perlian Wars, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Meflian War began and ended in the days of Ezekias; the second in the Reign of Manasse: but to avoid the trouble of interrupting our History, I have thought it best, to relate them both in this place. Other introduction is needless, than to say, that the Posterity of Heracles, driving the issue of Pelop, and the Achaeans, out of their Seats, divided their Lands between themselves, and erected the Kingdoms of Lacedaemon, Argos, Meflia, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the Bond of Kindred, and sought one anothers ruin with bloody Wars; whereof these Meflian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Meflian Warfare scarce worth remembrance; they were to fight. Ambition was the true cause of it; whereas the Lacedaemonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour, to accomplish their greedy desires. Yet other matter was alleged; namely, that one Polycharis a Meflian had slain many Lacedaemonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to have him yielded into their hands, could not obtain it. The Meflian on the other side, excused Polycharis, for that he was grown frantic, through injuries received from Enphras a Lacedaemonian.

This Enphras had bargained to give Phaistos to the Cattel of Polycharis, and was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gain appointed, he sold the Cattel, and Slaves that he kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a fair Tale to his Friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilst the Lys was yet scarce out of his mouth; one of the Slaves that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedaemonians being thus deprehened, offered all, and promised large amends; which to receive, he carried the Son of Polycharis home with him, but having him at home, he villainously slew him. Wherefore, the Lacedaemonians having refused, after long fate made by the wretched Father, to do him right against this Thief and Murderer, sought now to pick matter of Quarrel out of those things, which he did in that madness, whereunto they themselves had cast him. So said the Meflian, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand into the Judgment of the Aphidians, who were as the general Council of Greece, or to any other fair cause. But the Lacedaemonians, who had a great desire to occupy the fair Country of Meflia, that lay close by them, were not content with such Allegations. They thought it enough, to have some shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old Injuries, to and without sending any Defence, secretly took an Oath, to hold War with Meflia, till they had maltreated it: which done, they seized upon Amphip, a frontier Town of that Province, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few escaping.

Hereupon the Meflian took Arms, and were met by the Enemy. A furious Battle was fought between them, which ended not until dark Night, with uncertain Victory. The Meflian did strongly encamp themselves; The Lacedaemonians, unable to force their Camp, returned home. This War began in the second year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lasted twenty years. The two Enemy Nations tried the Matter, for a while with their proper Forces; the Lacedaemonians waiting the inland parts of Meflia; and the Meflian, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was no longer Friends on both sides, were called in to help. The Aradians, Argives, and Sicyonians, took part with Meflia; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their own, aid from Corinth, and hired Soldiers out of Cree. So a second, third, and fourth Battle were fought, with as great obstinacy as the first; saving that, in the fourth Battle, the Lacedaemonians were enforced to turn their backs; in the other Fights, the Victory was still uncertain, though though in one of them the Meflian lost Enphras their King, in whose stead they chose Arifdemus.

Many years were spent, ere all this Blood was shed; for patient Diseases, and want of Money to maintain Soldiers, caused the War to linger. And for the same Reasons, did the Meflian, forsake all their inland Towns, excepting Lisnos, which was a Mountain with a Town upon it, able to endure more, than the Enemies were likely to do.

But, as some Authors tell us, the Lacedaemonians were to oblige in this War, because of their Vow, that having abandoned themselves ten years from Sparta, their Wives sent them word, that their City would grow unpeopled, by reason that no children had been born them in all that time: Whereupon they sent back all their ablest young Men, promiscuously to accompany the young Women, who got to many of them with Child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus refers the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in process of this Meflian War, when the De-when the Lacedaemonians, hasted to quench the Fire before it should grow too hot, with such Forces as they could raise of their own men, without troubling their Friends, to deal with their Enemies, ere any Succour were lent them. So a strong Battle was fought between them, and a doubtful; save that the Meflian were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to think them their Equals. Particularly, the Valour of Arifdemus appeared such in this Fight, that his People would have made him their King: but he, refusing the Honour of that Name, accepted of the Burthen, and became their General.

Within one year another Battle was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedaemonians brought with them the Cratichians, and some other Friends to help: the Meflian had the Argives, Aradians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloody Fight; but Arifdemus did so behave himself, that finally he made the Enemies run for their Lives. Of such importance was this Victory, that the Lacedaemonians began to bethink themselves, of making some good Agreement. But one Tyrtaeus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-inforced their Spirits with his Verses. After this Arifdemus took by surprise a Town in Laconia, and vanquished in Fight Alexander King of Sparta, who did yet upon him, in hope to have recovered the Booty.

But all these Victories of Arifdemus perished in the loss of one Battle, whereof the Honour (if it were Honour) or surely the Profit, fell unto the Lacedaemonians, through the Treason of Arifdemus, King of Aradia, who being corrupted by the Enemies with Money, fled away, and left the Meflian exposed to a cruel Butchery. The loss was so great, that all Andania their principal City, and the Towns in Meflia, standing too far from the Sea, were abandoned, and for lack of Men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conveyed, as into a place of safety. Here the Lacedaemonians found a tedious work, that held them eleven years. For besides that Era it self was a strong piece, Arifdemus with three hundred stout Soldiers did many incredible Exploits that wearied them, and hindered their attendance on the Siege. He walked all the Fields of Meflia, that were in the Enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corn, Wine, Cattel, and all Provisions, necessary for his own People; the Slaves and Household-stuff he changed into Money, suffering the Owners to redeem them. To remedy this mischief the Lacedaemonians made an Edict, that neither Meflia, nor the adjoining parts of their own Country, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private Men, that were almost undone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtaeus appeared this Uproar with pleasing Songs. But Arifdemus grew so bold, that he not only ranged over all the Fields, but adventured upon the Towns, surprised, and sacked Amyle, and finally called the Enemies to enclose and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other Services, three Arifdemus was taken Prisoner; yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserves to be remembered, as a thing very strange and marvellous. He had with too much courage adventured to set upon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that Fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up senseless, and carried away Prisoner, with fifty

fifty of his Companions. There was a deep natural Cave into which the Spartans fled to call head-long, such as were condemned to die for the greatest Offences. To this punishment were Arifomenes and his Companions adjudged. All the rest of these poor Men died with their falls; Arifomenes (howsoever it came to pass) took no harm. Yet was it harm enough to be imprisoned in a deep Dungeon, among dead Carcasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceived by some small glimmering of Light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Fox that was gnawing upon a dead Body. Hereupon he thought himself, that this Beast must needs know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made himself to lay hold upon it, and catching it by the Tail with one hand, saved himself from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his Cost into the mouth of it. So letting it creep whither it would, he followed, holding it as his Guide, until the way was too faint for him; and then dimissed it. The Fox being loose, ran through a hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Arifomenes delve so long with his Nails, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some Fugitives of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Arifomenes was returned home, their Tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead Man was revived. But when the Carinian Forces, that came to help the Lacedæmonians in the Siege of Era, were cut in pieces, their Captains slain, and their Camp taken; then was it easily believed, that Arifomenes was alive indeed.

Thus eleven years passed whilst the Enemies hovering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Arifomenes with small Forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a Slave, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This Fellow had enticed to lewdness the Wife of a Messianian, and was entertained by her, when her Husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainy-winter-night, that the Husband came home unlooked for, whilst the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her Husband, asking him, by what good fortune he was returned so soon. He told her, that the storm of foul weather was such, as had made all his fellows leave their Stations, and that himself had done as the rest did; as for Arifomenes, he was wounded of late in Fight, and could not look abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the Enemies would stir, in such a dark-rainy-night, as this was. The Slave that heard these tidings, rose up secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Camp with the News. There he found Emperamus his Master, commanding in the King's absence. To him he uttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the Town. Little or nothing was done that Night. For the Alarm was presently taken; and the extreme darkness, together with the noise of Wind and Rain, hindered all Directions. All the next day was spent in most cruel Fight; one part being incited, by near hope of ending a long work; the other intraged by meer desperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompensed partly by the assistance, which Women and Children (to whom the hatred of servitude had taught contempt of death) gave to their Husbands and Fathers; partly by the narrowness of the Streets and other Passages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Messianians were in continual toil; their En-mies fought in course refreshing themselves with Meat and Sleep, and then returning supplied the places of their weary Fellows, with fresh Companies. Arifomenes therefore, perceiving that his Men, for want of Relief were no longer able to hold out, (as having been three days, and three nights, vexed with all miseries, of labour, watching, fighting, hunger, and thirst, besides continual rain and cold) gathered together all the weaker sort, whom he compassed round with armed Men, and so attempted to break out through the midst of the Enemies. Emperamus General of the Lacedæmonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a fair passage to these desperate mad-men. So they issued forth, and arrived safe in Acadia, where they were most lovingly entertained.

Upon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Acadians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Arifomenes their false hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Arifomenes had placed his followers in safety, he chose out five hundred the loftiest of his Men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret haste to Sparta, hoping to find the Town secure, and ill manured, the people being run forth to the Spoil of Messene. In this Enterprize, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recover their own, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Acadians that offered to join with him; but Arifomenes marred all, by sending speedy Advertisement hereof, to Alexander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Alexander sent back to Arifomenes, was intercepted, by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falsehood, which being published in open assembly, the Acadians flung him to death, and casting forth his Body unburied, erected a Monument of his Treachery, with a Note, That the Perjuror can not deceive God.

Of Arifomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his People to the charge of his Son Geryus and other sufficient Governours, who should plant them in some new Seat abroad, he resolved himself to make abode in those parts, hoping to find the Lacedæmonians work at home. His Daughters he bestowed honourably in Marriage. One of them Demagetus who reigned in the Isle of Rhodes took to Wife, being wiled by an Oracle, to marry the Daughter of the best Man in Greece. Finally Arifomenes went with his Daughter to Rhodes; whence he purposed to have travelled unto Arady the Son of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but Death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Messianians were invited by Anaxilas (whose great Grandfather was a Messianian and went into Italy after the former War) being Lord of the Rhigiens in Sicily, to take his part against the Zancleians in Sicily, on the other side of the Straits. They did so; and winning the Town of Zancle, called it Messene, which Name it keeps to this day.

This second Messianian War ended in the first year of the twenty eighth Olympiad. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home served the Lacedæmonians, found means to rebel; but were soon vanquished, and being driven to forsake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after few Ages, they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians; and then followed lowered their ancient Countreimen into Italy and Sicily; some of them went into Africa, where they chose unto themselves a Seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and fourcore years, this banished Nation retained their Name, their ancient Customs, Language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their forsaken Country, with a desire to return to it. In the third year of the hundred and second Olympiad, that great Epaninondas, having tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, revoked the Messianians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaninondas restore unto them their old Possession, and help them in building a fair City, which, by the name of the Province, was called Messene, and was held by them ever after, in despite of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they never from thenceforth stood in fear.

S. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media. Whether Dejeoces were that King Arphaxad mentioned in the History of Judith.

WHILE Manasse reigned. Whether Dejeoces the Mede were that King Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Book of Judith. Of the History of Judith.

Arady King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messianian War. Arady succeeding unto his Father Gyges, began his Reign of nine and forty years, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his Father, who encroaching upon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletum and Smyrna. In like manner Arady won Priene, and assailed Miletum; but went away without it. In his Reign, the Commerians, being expelled out of their own Country by the Sophians, over-ran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this Man's Grand child, by whom they were driven out. They had not only broken into Lydia, but won the City of Sardis; though the Castle or Citadel thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Arady; whose long Reign was unable, by reason of this great storm, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King until the third year of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six years after the Messianian War ended; the same being the last year of Manasse his Reign over Judah.

Dejeoces the Father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fifty of these five and fifty years in which Manasse reigned. This Dejeoces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict Form, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessors had done. For they following the example of Arphaxad, had given to the People so much Licence, as caused every one to desire the whole-some severity of a more Lordly King. Herein Dejeoces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he took unto him a Guard, for defense of his Person; he seldom gave preference, which also when he did, it was with high Anterity, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like Ceremonies he bred in the People an awful regard, and highly upheld the Majesty, which his Predecessors had almost letten fall, through neglect of due Comportments. In execution of his Royal Office, he did uprightly and severely administer Justice, keeping secret Spies to inform him of all that was done in the Kingdom. He cared not to enlarge the Bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching upon others; but studied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this King, and such as were before him, seems to have bred that opinion which Herodotus delivers, that Dejeoces was the first who reigned in Media.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the Story of Judith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slain, and Holophernes sent to work wonders, upon Phid and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last year of Dejeoces to have been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the Reign of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In fitting this Book of Judith to a certain time, there hath much labour been spent, with ill success. The Reigns of Cambyses, Darius, Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, have been sought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Jerusalem, have been thought upon, and this Age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmino, as agreeing best with the Story; though others herein cannot (I speak of such as I am would) agree with him. Whilst Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the Story of Judith, is found standing and dedicated: The other two Perfians, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have been very favourable to the Jews; wherefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor; whose part they refused to take; and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes, hath little convenience, slightly facing this History; and above all the opinions of a few ancient Writers (without whose Judgment the Authority of this Book were of no value) having placed this Argument in the Perfian Monarchy, inclines the Matter to the Reign of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, ascribe him to the Babylonians. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this History, there must be a return from Captivity; lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Tachim High Priest; and a long Peace, of threecore and ten years or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Jews. Likewise on the other side, we must find a King that reigned in Ninive, eighteen years at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jews refused to assist; one that sought to be generally adored as God, and that therefore commanded, all Temples of such as were accounted gods to be destroyed; one whole Vice-Roy or Captain General knew not the Jewish Nation, but was fain to learn what they were, of the bordering People.

Of all these Circumstances; the Priesthood of Tachim, with a return from Captivity, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasse before the destruction of Jerusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long Peace following, agree with the Reign of Xerxes; the rest of Circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captivity of the Jews and desolation of the City. Wherefore the brief decision of this Controversie is, that the Book of Judith is not Canonical. Yet hath Tornellius done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposed, that under Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and re-edified the City of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Dejoces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted; he adds that from the twelfth year to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is five or six years, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes, in his Grecian expedition (which he supposed to have been so long) might give occasion unto Arphaxad, of rebelling; and that Nabuchodonosor having vanquished and slain Arphaxad, might then seek to make himself Lord of all, by the Army which he sent forth under Holofernes. So should the Jews have done their duty, in adhering to Xerxes their Sovereign Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances, rehearsed before be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affairs of Jerry were agreeable to the History of Judith, and such a King as he supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Jews, and as proud as we shall need to think him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away belief, from this conjecture; and the supposition it self is very hard, that a Rebel, whose King was abroad, with an Army consisting of seventeen hundred thousand Men, should presume to go far, upon the strength of twelve hundred thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Archers on Horseback, as to think that he might do what he list, yea that there was none other God than himself. It is indeed easie to find enough that might be laid against this device of Tornellius: yet if there were any necessity, of holding the Book of Judith, to be Canonical, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all do, the Text it self. That Judith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmin (whose works I have not read, but find him cited by Tornellius) hath proved by many arguments. That she lived not in the Reign of Manasse, Tornellius hath proved very substantially, shewing how the Cardinal is driven, as it were, to break through a Wall, in saying that the Text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, found out by Tornellius, are the Children of mere fantasy, it is to plain, that it needs no proof at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which have contended about the time of this History, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stony field) have chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, extra anni solisque vias, in an Age that never was, and in places that were never known.

Judith.

2. v. 25.

Surely to find out the borders of Japheth, which were towards the South, and over against Arabia; or the Countries of Phad and Lad, that lay in Holofernes his way; I think it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question had done Chronologers. But I will not busy my self herewith; having already so far digressed, in shewing who lived not with Manasse, that I think it high time to return unto mine own work, and rehearse what others I find, to have had their part, in the long time of his Reign.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

THE first year of Manasse was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one year the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabine chosen; a peaceable Man and favouring very religious in his kind. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed only in Wars, to some good Civility, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as persuading them, that he had familiarity with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which he delivered unto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these devices of Numa were, in his own judgment, no better than mere delusions; that served only as rudiments, to bring the Savage multitude of Thieves and Out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to some form of milder discipline, than their boisterous and wild natures was otherwise apt to entertain. This appeared by the Books that were found in his Grave, almost six hundred years after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himself was condemned as vain. His Grave was opened by chance; in digging a piece of Ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffins or Chests of Stone were in it, with an inscription in Greek and Latine Letters, which said that Numa Pompilius the Son of Pompo, King of the Romans lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his body being utterly consumed. In the other were his Books wrapped up in two bundles of wax; of his own Constitutions seven, and other seven of Philology. They were not only uncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretor of the City desiring to have a sight of these Books, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a solemn Oath, that they were against the Religion then in use. Hereupon the Senate, without more ado, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seems that Numa did mean to acquire himself, unto wiser Ages which he thought would follow, as one that had not been so foolish as to believe the Doctrine wherein he instructed his own barbarous times. But the poison which he had infected Rome, when he sat in his Throne, had not left working, when he manifested the Antidote out of his Grave. Had these Books not come to light, until the days of Tully and Cicero, when the mist of ignorance was somewhat better dissipated; likely it is that they had not only escaped the Fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure general) effect. Being as it was, they served as a confusion, without remedy, of Idolatry that was inveterate.

Numa Reigned three and forty years in continual peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the six and fortieth of Manasse, and Reigned two and thirty years, buifed, for the most part in War. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to fear, that might grow unto them from the Thyrcians, caused them to bethink themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weak for a common Enemy, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There

There were in each Camp three Brethren, Twins born at one Birth (Diomysius says that they were Cousin Germans) of equal years and strength, who were appointed to fight for their several Countries. They were that the Horatii, Champions for the Romans got the Victory, though two of them first lost their lives. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Livy tells it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slain; but the third Horatius, pretending fear, did run away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts could not follow him with equal speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning upon them, he slew them, as it had been in single fight. Man after Man, ere they could joyn together and set upon him all at once. Diomysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling very particularly, what wounds were given and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatii was slain, then one of the Curatii, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly sever one from the other as he threwed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman History, both in regard of the action it self, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in wager, against Alba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the City of Alba did immediately become subject unto her own Colony, and was shortly after, upon some treacherous dealing of their Governor, utterly razed, the People being removed unto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Lains, whereof Alba, as the mother City, had been chief, became ere long dependent upon Rome, though not subject unto it, and divers petty States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of sundry ages, and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) until such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancy, shall grow to be the main subject of this History.

The seventh year of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasse. Also the three last Governors for ten years, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find only the names, Lycrates, Aphander, and Erichia. After Erichia yearly Rulers were elected.

These Governors for ten years, were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of Rule was shortened, and from term of life reduced unto ten years; it being thought likely, that they would Govern the better, when they knew, that they were afterwards to live private Men under the command of others. I follow Diomysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times unto those years of the Olympiad, wherein the Chronological Table, following this work, doth set them. For he not only professeth himself to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted always the years of the Greeks, how they did answer unto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of his History. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first year of the seventh Olympiad, and affirms, that the same was the first year of Charops his Government in Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Paulinus, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the Reign of Manasse it was, that Midus, whom the Poets feigned to have had Afles Ears, held the Kingdom of Phrygia. Many Fables were devised of him; especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which means he had like to have been starved (his Meat and Drink being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from his miserable slavery, by causing him to walk himself in the River Pactolus, the Stream whereof hath ever since forthwith, abounded in that precious Metal. Finally it is said, he dyed by drinking Bulls Blood; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the Life of Romulus) observed the Moons Eclipse at the Foundation of Rome.

The Milefians, or (as Eschylus hath it) the Athenians, having obtained some power by Sea, founded Maciocrata a City on the Coast of Aegypt. Plutarchus herein seems to have alluded them, who used all means of drawing the Greeks into Aegypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus, nor Athens, were now of power sufficient, to plant a Colony in Aegypt by force.

About this time Archias with his Companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracuse in Sicily: a City in after-times exceeding famous.

The City of Nicomedia, sometime Alaenae, was enlarged and beautified in this age, by Ziotes Native of Thrace. Sibylla of Samos according to Paulinus lived about this time.

About these times also was Cronos founded upon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the Companion of Archias that built Syracuse: Syracuse makes it somewhat more ancient, and so doth Paulinus.

About the same time, the Parthians, being of age, and banished Lacedaemon, were conducted by Phalaris into Italy, where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Justine and Paulinus find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified. Also about the same time, Manasse yet living, the City Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Cela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Umbris, now called Urbis in Italy. About which time also Chalcidius in Asia, over-against Byzantium, (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses: who therefore were upbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long work to rehearse all that is said to have been done in the five and fifty years of Manasse: that which hath already been told is enough: the rest, being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, rehearsing only Den Merodach, and Nabulasser, to the business that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of Manasse to the destruction of Jerusalem.

§. I.

Of Ammon and Josias.

AMMON the Son of Manasse, a Man no less wicked than was his Father before his Conversion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatry: for which

2 King 21. God hardened the hearts of his own Servants against him: who il-w him after he had reigned two years: Philo, Lulubius and Nicophorus give him ten years, following the Septuagint.

Josias succeeded unto Ammon, being but a Child of eight years old. He began to seek after the God of David his Father, and in his twelfth year, he purged Juda and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten Images. He caused all the Images, as well those which were Graven, as Molten, to be stamp'd to Powder, and strewed on their Graves that had erected them: and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sun and Moon, and caused the Carriots and Horles of the Sun to be burnt. Of Josias it was prophesied, in the time of Jeroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calf at Bethel, that a Child should be born unto the House of David, Josias by name, and upon thee (said the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall be sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burn incense upon thee. A Prophecy very remarkable.

In the eighteenth year of his Reign, he rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Heliah the Priest found the Book of Moses, called Deuteronomy, or, of the Law, which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the severe Commandments therein written, the prosperity promis'd to those that observe them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his Garments, and commanded Heliah, and others, to ask Counsel of the Prophets Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Book, who answered the Messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, behold I will bring evil upon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curses that are written in the Book, which they have read before the King of Juda, because they have forsaken me, and burnt incense to other Gods. Only for the King himself, because he was a lover of God and of his Laws, it was promised that this evil should not fall on Juda and Jerusalem in his days, but that he himself should inherit his Grave in peace.

Josias assembled the Elders, caused the Book to be read unto them, made a Covenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Jerusalem and Benjamin to do the like, promising thereby to observe the Laws and Commandments in the Book contained.

The execution done by Josias upon the Altar, Idols, Monuments, and Bones of the false Prophets, at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended unto those Countries, that had been part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Yet I do not think, that any Victory of Josias in War got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Sennacherib, when Merodach opposed himself against Asorhaddon, did use the advantage which the Faction in the North presented unto him, and laid hold upon so much of the Kingdom of Israel, as he was able to People. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himself unable to deal with Psammetichus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the Siege of Azotus, though the Town held out nine and twenty years) did give unto Manasse, together with his liberty as much in Israel, as himself could not easily defend. This was a good way to break the amity that the Kings of Juda had to long held with those of Egypt, by casting a Bone between them, and withal by this benefit of enlarging their Territory with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendship of the Jews, which had been lost by injuries done, in seeking to bereave them of their own. When it is said, that Manasse did after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captains of war in all the strong Cities of Juda; it may be that some such business is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he took much pains, in making Jerusalem itself more defensible; yet I should rather believe, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortify himself against the Egyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he travelled in making such provisions, only for his minds sake. The earnestness of Josias in the King of Babel his quarrel, doth argue, that the composition which Manasse had made, with that King or his Ancestor, was upon such friendly terms, as required not only a faithful observation, but a thankful requital. For no persuasions could suffice to make Josias sit still, and hold himself quiet in good neutrality, when Pharaoh Neco King of Egypt passed along by him, to War upon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The last year of Josias his Reign it was, when as Neco the Son of Psammetichus, came with a powerful Army towards the border of Juda, determining to pass that way being the nearest toward Euphrates, either to fight enghen the passages: 2 Chron. 35: 12 that River, about Careemish or Cereethum, for the defence of Syria (as long after this; Diodorus is said by Amianthus Marcellinus to have done) or perhaps to invade Syria itself. For it seemeth that the travel of Psammetichus had not been idly considered about that one Town of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged unto the Adadi Kings of Damascus.

Neither was the industry of Neco less than his Fathers had been, in pursuing the War against Babel. In which War, two things may greatly have availed the Egyptians, and advanced their affairs and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Soldiers than

Egypt

Egypt could of it self afford; and the danger wherein Affrica stood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feel it self better; and to shew what it could do. These were great helps, but of shorter endurance than was the War; as in place more convenient shall be noted. At present it seems, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did invite the King of Egypt, into the Countries bordering upon Euphrates; whither Pharaoh Neco ascended with a mighty Army.

These two great Monarchs, having their Swords drawn, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Josias advised with himself to which of these he might adhere, having his Territory set in the mid way between both, so as the one could not invade the other, but that they must of necessity tread upon the very face and body of his Country; Now though it were to his Neco himself desired by his Embassadors, leave to pass along by Juda, protesting that he directed himself against the Affrians only, without all harmful purpose against Josias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had alliance therein: as that of Hofea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Affrian, and wholly trulited to Sabacus or Som King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his Life and Estate, which the Affrian so rooted up and tare in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell upon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezekias, whilst that good King and his people relied upon Serbon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasse, were documents of sufficient proof, to shew the ill assurance, that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (near neighbours though they were) were always unready; when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seek, to have the Jews renew there ancient league with him, but only craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the passage between him and the Affrians. This was an easy thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Army, as did loon after this out-face Nebuchadnezzar, upon his own borders, left unto the Jews, a lawfull excuse of fear, had they forborn to give it any check upon the way. Wherefore I believe, that this religious and virtuous Prince Josias, was not stirred up only by politic respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himself bound in Faith and Honour, to do his best in defence of the Babylonian Crown; whereunto his Kingdom was obliged, either by Covenant made at the enlargement of Manasse, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians, what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their Enemy.

Some think, that this action of Josias, was contrary to the advice of Jeremy the Prophet; which I do not find in the Prophecy of Jeremy, nor can find reason to believe. Others hold opinion, that he forgot to ask the counsel of God: and this is very likely; seeing he might believe that an enterprise grounded upon fidelity and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing unto the Lord. But the wickedness of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such root, as all the care of Josias in reforming the Land, could not pluck up) was questionable far from hearkning how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should give entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Josias levying all the strength he could make, near unto Megiddo, in the half Tribe of Manasse, encountered Neco; and there he received the stroke of death, which lingering about him till he came to Jerusalem, brought him to the Sepulchres of his Ancestors. His loss was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Jeremy the Prophet: who inferred a Lament. 4: 7-9, 22. sorrowful remembrance thereof into his Book of Lamentations.

§ II.

Of Pharaoh Neco, that fought with Josias: Of Jehoahaz and Jehoakim Kings of Juda.

Of these Wars, and particularly of this Victory, Herodotus hath mention, among the Acts of Neco. He tells us of this King, that he went about to make a Channel, whereby Ships might pass, out of Nilus into the Red-Sea. It should have reached above a hundred Miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the midst of the work, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when half was done. There were consumed in this toilsome business twelve hundred thousand Egyptians; a loss great enough to make the King forsake his enterprise, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoever it were he was not a Man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and levied a great Army, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he used the services, as well of his Navy, as of his Land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found Recorded, save only this Victory against Josias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdala, and the Jews Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Juda was a Province of Syria, and Magdala or Magdala is taken to have been the same place (though diversly named) in which this battle was fought. After this, Neco took the City of Cadysh, which was perhaps Careemish, by Euphrates, and made himself Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Josaphus witnesseth.

Particularly we find, that the Phanicians, one of the most powerful Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they surrounded all Affrica, setting sail from the Gulf of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whereto they both landed, as need required, and sowed Corn for their sustenance, in that long Voyage which lasted three years. This was the first navigation about Affrica, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good Hope, was discovered; which after was forgotten, until Vasco de Gama the Portuguese found it out, following a contrary course to that which the Phanicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ran the way of the Sun, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the Pillars and Streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the Straights of Gibraltar, having Africa still on the right hand: but the Partingals, beginning their voyage not far from the same Straights, leave Africa on the Larboard, and bend their course unto the East. That report of the Phoenicians, which Herodotus durst not believe, how the Sun in this journey was on their right hand, that is, on the Northside of them, is a manifest of necessary truth; and the observation then made hereof, makes me the better to believe, that such a Voyage was indeed performed.

But leaving these Discourses of Neco his magnificence, let us tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Juda, while the Aegyptians were buile at Carchemish, had Jehoiakim their King, in the room of his Father Josiah. The Prophet Jeremy calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger Brother; aluding perhaps to the short Reign of Shallum King of the ten Tribes: for Shallum of Israel Reigned but one month; Jehoiakim no more than three. He was not the eldest Son of Josiah: Wherefore it may seem that he was set up as the best affected unto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Aegyptian, as appears by the sequel.

An Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when Neco had dispatched his business in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affairs of Juda. This Country was now so far from making any resistance, that the King himself came to Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where the matter went so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into Bonds and carry him prisoner into Egypt, giving away his Kingdom to Eliakim his elder Brother, to whom of right it did belong. This City of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place unhappy to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may be observed in divers examples. Yet here Jehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdom, an ill gain since he could no better use it. But however Jehoiakim thrived by the bargain, Pharaoh sped well, making that Kingdom, Tributary, without any stroke stricken, which three Months before was too stout to give him peace, when he desired it. Certain it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying upon his hands, than would permit him to wait his forces upon Juda: but now the reputation of his good success at Megiddo, and Carchemish, together with the diffusion of the Princes Josiah his Sons (of whom the eldest is probably thought to have stormed at the preference of his younger Brother) gave him power to do even what should please himself. Yet he did forbear to make a Conquest of the Land; perhaps upon the same reason which had made him so earnest in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Jews had suffered much, in the Aegyptian quarrel, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven to forsake that party and join with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithful, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaim them; seeing they were such a people, as would not upon every occasion shift side, but endure more, than Pharaoh, in the pride of his Victories, thought that any heretofore should lay upon them: to good a Patron did he mean to be unto them. Nevertheless he laid upon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of Silver, and one Talent of Gold; that so he might both reap at the present, some fruit of his pains taken, and leave unto them some document in the future, of greater punishment than verbal anger, due to them, if they should rebel. So he departed carrying along with him into Egypt the unfortunate King Jehoiakim, who died in his Captivity.

The Reign of Jehoiakim was included in the end of his Fathers last years; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Jehoiakim his successor did Reign ten whole years; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that is current and incomplete. If any Man will rather call the three Months of this short Reign, into the first year of the Brother, than into the Fathers last; the same Arguments that shall maintain his opinion, will also prove the matter to be unworthy of Disputation; and so I leave it.

Jehoiakim in Impiety was like his Brother, in Faction he was altogether Aegyptian, as having received his Crown at the hand of Pharaoh. The wickedness of these last Kings, being exprest in Scriptures none otherwise than by general words, with reverence to all the evil that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that the poison wherewith Ahas and Manasse had infected the Land was not so expelled by the zealous goodness of Josiah, but that it still cleaved unto the chief of the people, Ten unto the chief of the Priests. 2 Chron. 34. 14. and therefore it was not strange that the Kings had their part therein. The Royal authority was much abated by the dangers wherein the Country stood, in this troublesome Age: the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings forbear to profess, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jehoiakim had the countenance of the Aegyptian to grace it, which made him insolent and cruel; as we find by that example of his dealing with Uria the Prophet: though, herein also the Princes do appear to have been infligators. This holy Man denounced Gods judgments against the City, and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same Age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to Death. Hereupon the poor Man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had unto Jehoiakim, that Uria was delivered unto his Embassadors, and sent back to the Death; contrary to the custom used, both in those days and unto Strangers, that are not held guilty of such inhumane Crimes, as for the general good of mankind should be exempted from all privileges.

It concerned Pharaoh to give all contentment possible to Jehoiakim; for the Affrian Lion that had not stirred in many years, began about these times, to roar so loud upon the Banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Ninus, threatening to make himself Lord of all the Forre. The cables that hitherto had withdrawn the house of Merodach from opposing the Aegyptian in his Conquests of Syria, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Carchemish, where shortly after this, the glory of Egypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to pass that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their business in Syria; which caused them to lose that Province.

Merodach the Son of Badadan who taking the advantage that Sennacherib's misadventure and death, together with the diffusion between his Children Children presented, made himself King of Babylon, was eleven years troubled with a powerful Enemy Ashaddad the Son of Sennacherib, reigning over the Affrians in Nineve; from whom whilst he could not any other way divert his cares, he was fain to omit all business in Syria, and (as hath been formerly shewed) to make over unto Ezraia, some part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Ashaddad did not only set him free, but gave unto him some part of Affria, if not (as is commonly but less probably thought) the whole Kingdom. How greatly this was to the liking of the Affrians I will not here stand to enquire; his long Reign following, and his little interfering in matters of Syria make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Tyrphus gives him the honour of having won Nineve to self; which we may believe; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the time soon following, that great City was free, and vanquished Pharates the Median. Perhaps he yielded upon some capitulation: and refused afterwards to continue subject when the Kings being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Affrian King whose Captains took Manasse Prisoner; but I rather believe those that sold the contrary; for which I have given my reasons in due place: To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Jews were his Friends, and the Aegyptians, that maligned the Northern Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was until the time of Plammicus, about the end of this Kings Reign, or the beginning of his Son.

Ten Merodach the Son and successor of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speak little of his doings. The length of his Reign is gathered by inference to have been one and twenty years, for so much remaineth of the time that passed between the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephews Reigns (which is a known sum) deducting the years of his Father, and of his Son Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasse Prisoner and released him. He sped ill in Syria; where Plammicus, by the vertue of his mercenary Greeks, did much prevail. This may have been some cause that he released Manasse, and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdom of Samaria; which is made probable by circumstances alleged before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his Father Ten Merodach, had greater business in his own Kingdom, than would permit him to look abroad: inasmuch as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or over-sight of Plammicus and Neco, that they did not occupy some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Pharates King of the Medes invaded Affria, and besieged Nineve; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remove by the coming of Syrians, who in those ages did over-flow those parts of the World, laying hold upon all, that they could master by strong hand. Of these Syrians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is convenient that I speak in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, upon whom they first fell, were builed in the same times with hopes of conquering Affria.

Pharates, the Son of Dejaces, King of the Medes, having by many Victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a fair possibility of making himself Lord of Nineve.

That City (as Herodotus reports it) having been a Sovereign Lady was not forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her self she was well enough.

This makes it plain, that howsoever Merodach had gotten possession of this Imperial Seat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Country; yet it found the means to set it self at liberty; as after this again it did appear, when it had been regained by Nabulassar his Grand-child.

Sharp War, and the very novelty of sudden violence, use to difmay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but custom of danger hardeneth even those that are unwarlike. Nineve had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted all the fury, wherewith either Domestical tumults between the Sons of Sennacherib, or Foreign War of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the less wonderful, that Pharates did speed so ill in his journey against it. He and the most of his Army perished in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps he undervalued their Forces, and brought a less power than was needful.) It is enough, that we may herein believe Herodotus.

Cyaxares the Son of Pharates, a braver Man of War than his Father, was as much of Asia the leas, as lay Eastward, from the River of Hays; he sought revenge upon the Affrians for the death of his Father, and besieged Nineve to self, having a purpose to destroy it. I rather believe Eusebius, that he took the City and fulfilled his displeasure upon it, than Herodotus, that the Syrian Army came upon him whilst he lay before it. For where equal Authorities are contradictory (as Eusebius, though far later than Herodotus, yet having seen other Authors, that are now lost, is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it best, to yield unto the best likelihoods.

To think that the Syrians came upon Cyaxares, whilst he lay before Nineve, were to accuse him of greater improvidence, than ought to be suspected in one commended as a good Soldier. But to suppose that he was fain to leave the Town, when a War so dangerous fell upon his own Country, doth well agree both with the condition of such business as that Syrian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldean and Affrian affairs ensuing.

The destruction of this great City is both foretold in the Book of Isaiah, and there set down as happening about these times; of which Book whoever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the Story of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause us to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecy of Nabum, though it be not limited unto any certain term, yet it appears to have taken effect, in the final destruction of Nineve by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, whereof we will speak in due place. Some that ascribe more Authority, than the reformed Churches yield, to the Book of Tobit, are careful, as in a matter of necessity, to affirm, that about these times Nineve was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the Victory over it, to Ten Merodach: a needless conjecture, if the place of Eusebius be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the Son of Ten Merodach did seize upon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such such time as the Country of Affria was abandoned by Cyxares, when the Scythian War overwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out ready to his hand; the swelling Spirits of the Nimivie were allayed, and their malice to Babylon so allayed, that it might be thought a great favour, if Nabulassar, appointing unto them a peculiar King, took him and them into protection: though afterwards, to their confusion, this unthankful People and their King, rebelled again, as shall be shewed in the Reign of Nabuchodonosor.

§. IV.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twenty years.

†. I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I have shewed, what impediment was given by the Affrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled, to perform any action of worth upon the Egyptians in Syria: it is time that I speak of that great Scythian expedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adjacent, in such wise that part of the trouble redounded even to the Egyptians themselves. Of the Scythian People in general, Herodotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill known, with many Fables; of this expedition he tells many particulars, but ill agreeing with content of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needless to rectify them, for they are far enough distant from the business in hand. The computation of times, which by inference out of his relations, may seem very strange, needeth some answer in this place: left otherwise I should either seem to make my self too bold with an Author, in citing him after a manner different from his own tale; or else to be too forgetful of my self, in bringing to act upon the Stage, those Persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty years he saith that the Scythians reigned in Asia, before Cyxares delivered the Country from them. Yet he reports a War, between Cyxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the Siege of Nimivie; the Siege of Nimivie being ere the Scythians came. And further he tells, how the Scythians, having vanquished the Medes, did pass into Syria, and were encountered in Palastina by Plammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. These Narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, be true; though not in such order of time as he hath marshalled them. For Plammiticus was dead before Cyxares began to Reign; and Cyxares had spent half of his forty years, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; so that he could not, after those Lydian Wars, Reign eight and twenty years together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Plammiticus the Son of Pharaoch Neco, by the name of Plammiticus; and this King Plammiticus may, by some strained conjecture, be thought to have been that met with the Scythians: for he lived with both Cyxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himself refers all that business of the Scythian irruption into Palastina, to Plammiticus the Father of Neco, whom he leaves dead before the Reign of Halyattes. Therefore

I dare not rely upon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to believe him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them down.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can, those Memorials which I find of this expedition scattered in divers places: a work necessary, for that the greatness of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in a general History; yet not easie, the content of those that have written thereof, being nothing near to uniformity.

I have noted before, that in the Reign of Ardis King of Lydia, the Chimmerians over-ran that Kingdom, and were not expelled, until Halyattes the Nephew of Ardis got the upper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardis, Sadyattes, and Halyattes, are we to find the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned over Asia. Now forasmuch as Plammiticus the Egyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their prosperity, we must needs allow more than one or two of his last years, unto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reign in Lydia, being three and twenty years complete after the death of Plammiticus, leaves the space very scant, either for the great Victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Egyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must have received ere they could be driven quite away. To increase this difficulty, the victorious Reign of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we think it possible, that he should have adventured the strength of his Kingdom against the Egyptians and Jews, had he stood in daily fear of losing his own; to a more mighty Nation, that lay upon his Neck? To speak simply as it appears to me; the Victories ascribed to Cyxares and Halyattes over these warlike People, were not obtained against the whole body of their Army, but were the defeitures of some Troops, that infected their several Kingdoms; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar having the like success, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the outrages of these hardy Northern Lads. Wherefore we may probably annex the eight and twenty years of the Scythians Rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassar's Reign, in compals whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can lay of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of these Oppressors.

†. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their journey.

Touching the expedition it self, Herodotus tells us, that the Chimmerians being driven out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians not contented with having won the Land of the Chimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into far removed quarters of the World, so (as it were by chance) falling upon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of Men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Chimmerians were an odious and base People; the Scythians, as mischievous and foolish; or else, Herodotus, and some other of his Country Men, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had been beaten, and Ionis, more than once, grievously wronged. The great valour of the Chimmerians of Cimbria is so well known, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greeks is insufficient to stain them with the note of Cowards. These were the posterity of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Western World; and whose re-flow did overwhelm no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now treat. He that would more largely inform himself of their Original and Actions, may peruse Georgius Bezanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Book, that may be verified, which the learned Orelusius is said to have spoken, of all Georgius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we find it proved, by such Arguments and Authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Chimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one Lineage and Nation; whosoever distinguished in name, by reason of their divers Tribes, Professions, or perhaps Dialect of Speech. Homér indeed hath mention of the Chimmerians; whose Country whether he place in the West, as near unto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being far from the Sun, and covered with Eternal darkness; certain it is that he would have them near Neighbors to Hell: for he had the same quarrel to them, which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them seem a kind of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his Life affirms) to insert into his Works the names of such as lived in his own times, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himself deserved. And for this reason it is proved by Eusebius, that the Chimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Country. Perhaps, that Invasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homér puts a remembrance into Praxinos his Discourse with Helen, was the very fame, which Eusebius noteth to have happened somewhat before the age of Homér, at what time the Chimmerians with the Amazons, together invaded Asia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons; and the Chimmeris (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often break into Greece and Asia; which though it be not in express terms written, that they did with joyned Forces, yet seeing they invaded the self-same places, it may well be gathered, that they were Companions. One journey of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the Streights of the Chimmerians, as we find in Diodore, who further telleth us, that the Scythians therein gave them assistance. The same Author, before his entry into those discourses of the Amazons, which himself acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have been Wives of the Scythians, and no less Warlike than their Husbands; alleging the example of that Queen, who is said to have slain the great Perseus Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their Wives along with them to the Wars; and how desperate the courage was of those Women; the terrible descent of them into Italy, when Marius the Roman overthrew them, gives proof sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; other place will give me better leisure to speak of them: but seeing that they are noted by divers Historians to have belonged unto the Chimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may the better approve Georgius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were near Allies.

Now concerning the expulsion of the Chimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to have been none other than the sending a Colony of them forth into Asia, with an Army of Scythians to help them, in purchasing a new Seat, and establishing the Plantation.

The Sarmatians also were Companions in this journey. For the City of Novograd in Russia (which Country is the fame that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was up in Arms: and therefore it is no marvel though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the same People made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Mosca; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their Neighbors; they had in their Army above three hundred thousand fighting Men, besides a huge Multitude of Women and Children; they wandered over many Countries, beating all down before them; and finally, thinking to have settled themselves in Italy, they divided their Company, for the more easie passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible Betrels by the Roman Consuls. Mere necessity enforced these poor Nations, to trouble the World, in following such hard adventures. For their Country, being more fruitful of Men than of sustenance, and shut up on the North-side with intolerable cold, which denied it self that way to their overwhelming Multitudes; they were compelled to discharge upon the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of possession, as having title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more civil, People had. Their sturdy Bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardships, gave them great advantage over such as were accustomed unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore commonly they prevailed very far; their next Neighbors giving them free passage, that they might the sooner be rid of them; others giving them, besides passage, Victuals and Guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great presents; so as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate People.

†. III.

Of the Chimmerians War in Lydia.

THE first Company of these, consisting for the most part of Chimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had fill on the right hand; leaving on the other side, and behind them, the great Mountains of Caucasus. These having passed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelia, entered the Country of Pontus, and being arrived in Papilagonis, fortified the Promontory whereon Sinope, a famous Haven Town of the Greeks, was after built. Here it seems that they bestowed the weakest and most unserviceable of their Train, together with the heaviest part of their Carriages, under some good Guard: as drawing near to those Regions, in Conquest whereof they were to try the utmost hazard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spoke even now) dispose of their impediments, leaving them in a place of strength, where Arminius now stands, when they drew near unto Gaul, upon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchase. From Sinope, the way into Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionis, was shut and open to the Chimmerians, without any ledge of Mountains or deep deep Rivers to stay their march: for Iris and Haly they had already passed.

What Battles were fought between these Invaders and the Lydians, and with what variable success the one or other part was and lost, I find not written nor am able to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Arads, the Commerians got possession of Sardis, the Capital City of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Arads, Kings of Lydia, before this Invasion, and by Halyattes and Croesus in the times following; all that Arads did against the Commerians, and all, have burning the Milefians Cornfields, that was done in twelve years by Sardiates his Son (who was done in his hands so full of this business, that he could turn them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seem, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in those Wars; but were glad enough that they did not lose all.

Certainly, the Miseries of War are never so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their own Seats, labours to root out the established possessors of another Land, making room for themselves, their Wives and Children. They that fight for the mastery are pacified with Tribute, or with some other services and acknowledgments, which had they been yielded at the first, all had been quiet, and no Sword bloodied. But in these migrations, the Affiliants bring so little with them, that they need all which the Defendants have, their Lands and Cattle, their Houses and their Goods, even to the Cradles of the sucking Infants. The merciless terms of this controverted arm both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either win, or perish by Famine; the other defend their Goods, or lose their lives without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe have felt examples hereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was overthrown by such Invasions. But our Isle of Britain can best witness the diversity of Conquests; having by the happy Victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all civil Arts; in exchange of Liberty, that was but slenderly instructed therein before, whereas as the issue of the Saxon and Danish Wars, was, as were the causes, quite contrary. For these did not seek after the Dominion only, but the entire possession of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the British Race, and desolating all memorial of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Commerian Blood) found such end of their enterprise, as it may seem that the Commerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Asia, did arrive unto. So that by considering the process of the one, we shall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many Battles the Danes won; yet none of singular importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerors: Many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drive them quite away, and back from hence, after they had gotten firm footing. But in course of time, had bred such acquaintance even of utter enmity, as bowing the natures of both these People, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one mild temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great slaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their own Country wide enough to receive them, as having disbur-thened it self of many thousands, that were sent to seek their Graves abroad. And last (as I think) was the end of the Commerian War in Lydia; whereunto though some Victory of Halyattes may have hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seems to have done most in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should fear to add herewith my further conjecture; which is, that the matter was so compounded between the Commerians and Halyattes, that the River of Haly should divide their Territories. For Haly was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eastern-side of the River was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Commerians and other Scythian People; whose Wives and Daughters these warlike Women are supposed to have been.

And herewith the quarrel ensuing, between Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certain Scythians, upon whom the Median sought revenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Commerians, being much weakened with mutual slaughters, should have joined in a League of mutual defence, for their common safety: though otherwise it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdom so far Westward, whatsoever the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the War between these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little weight, and less probability. He tells of Scythians, that were chafed out of their Country by faction, till it came unto Cyaxares; who committed unto them certain Boys, to be instructed in the Scythian Tongue, and feat of Archery. Now it to fell out (saith he) that these Scythians using much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did nevertheless otherwise mislead their Game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and choleric, bitter, they reviled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boys that was under their charge, whom, dressing like Venison, they presented unto him; which done they fled unto Halyattes. This Herodotus delivers, as the ground of a War that lasted six years between the Medes and Lydians; the latter King demanding these Fugitives to be delivered into his hand; the other refusing to betray such Men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians, to betake themselves to either of these Kings, unto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treachery that he shewed in the massacring of their Country Men, that were in his Kingdom; of whom it is now meet that we should speak.

† I V.

The War of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

AS the Commerians held their course Westward, along the shoars of the Euxine Sea: so the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and having the Caspian Sea on their left hand, passed between it and Caucasus through Albania, Colchene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Servan and Georgia, and so they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Arms; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilst Panaminicus Reigned in Aegypt. If it were in the sixth year of Nabulaffar's Reign over Babylon (supposing him to have Reigned five and Thirty; or otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then do the eight and twenty years of their Dominion end, one year before the Great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giving him good leave to provide securely, for the Invasion of Syria, which Expedition he began while his Father yet lived, as Josephus out of Berosus relates the History.

Now the Medes, desirous to save themselves as well they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no lust to a second trial of the Sword, refused not to undergo the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serve to remove these troublesome Guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasant and better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be persuaded, that a little more travel, would add a great deal more to their content. For they relied too much upon their own valour, that they feared no resistance; and being the bravest Men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes persuaded them into Aegypt I do not think: Babylon was near enough; whether if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his unfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulaffar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them I do not read. But it is well known, that his Dominions lay in the midst between Media and Aegypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary; wherefore we may very well believe, that they watered their Horses in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give them Preceder.

Panaminicus hearing of their progress (like the jealous Husband of a fair Wife) took care that they might not look upon Aegypt; left the fight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or persuasion, that he could use, would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow upon them, than on his Army that should keep them back. Aegypt was rich; and half the riches thereof had not been ill spent in laying all. Yet Panaminicus took the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had been so obligate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close upon the edge of the Wilderness in Gaza (as I take it) the Southernmost border of Palestina: whence he never advanced to meet with the Scythians; but gave them leave to feel as much of the scalding Sun-beams, as agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat upon them. When they were come as far as Ascalon, the next City to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heat of a Climate so far different from their own. Panaminicus had at his back a vast Wilderness, over the scorching fumes whereof, the Scythians more patient of Cold and wet, than of the contrary despatches, could ill have endured to pursue him, through unknown ways, had they fought with him and prevailed: especially the Kingdom of Aegypt being ready to entertain him with relief, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary journey. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visit their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Aegyptian King (besides that he preferred his own Estate from a dangerous adventure, by his great Army to depart from him) found all his Cost well repayed in the process of his Wars in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than ever troubled themselves, with the return of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolved now to seek no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they presumed to live at discretion upon the Country, taking what they lifted from the Owners; and many times (as it were to save the labour of taking off) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long used over the higher Asia, that is, over the Country lying between the Caspian and Red Seas, and between India and Asia the Less. Happy it was for the poor people, that in so large a space of ground, there was room enough for these new Conquerors; otherwise the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, upon those private Men, to whose wealth any Scythian did bear a fancy, would have lighted in general upon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellows. Yet it seems that the heaviest burthen lay upon Media; for it was a fruitful Country not far from their own home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the Constitution of their Bodies; there also it was that they had the fatal blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extreme Herod. lib. i. mity was no better than a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay unmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolved to prove what might be done by Stratagem. The managing of the business is thus delivered in brief; That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Scythians; made them drunk; and slew them; recovering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another slaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was revenged by their Contrivance, with greater cruelties than ever they had practised before. That the Scythians, which escaped this bloody Feat, made any fire in Media, I do not find; neither do I read that either in revenge hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by Invasion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more strange, for that the Army returning home out of Media was very strong, and encountered with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no less than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares to free his Country, took good effect, with less bloodshed than hath been supposed. For if he surprised all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtless in eight and twenty years had so well felted themselves, that they were delicious of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remain in the Country; many (of whom I shall speak anon) having done what they could in the business, for which they came forth, were willing to return home, with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might go joy with the Commerians in Lydia, or seek their fortunes in other Provinces, among their own Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to have been with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be understood, that a great part of the Scythians, upon hope of gain, or desire to keep what they had already gained, were content to become subject unto Nabulassar: Mens love of their wealth being most effectual, in taming the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. This is certain, that

Jer. 25. 9. Nabuchadnezzar, as ever after, join his first beginning of War, did beat the Egyptians, who in Ages foregoing had been accustomed to deal with the Babylonians, after another fashion: and this new success of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane means, to such addition as this of new Forces.

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, divers Authors report a Story, which confirms me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to assist their Kindred and Friends, in acquiring a new Seat, and establishing their Plantation. For these had left their Wives behind them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come again. The Scythian Women to comfort themselves in their Husbands absence, became bedfellows to their Slaves. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their return. If they were only the Children of Slaves which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would have it, who tells us, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their Bond-mens Eyes) it must needs be that they were very Boys, or else that the Women did very little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather believe the Tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set down, as find it, in Mr. Deſtor Fletcher his exact discourse of the Russe Commonwealth. They understood by the way that their Choloep, or Bond-slaves whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their Towns, Lands, Houses, Wives, and all. At which news being somewhat amazed, and yet disdaining the Villany of their Servants, they made the more speed home: and so far from Novogorod met them in Wallack manner marching against them. Whereupon advising what was best to be done, they agreed also to sit upon them with no other show of Weapon but with their Horse-whips (which as their manner is every Man rideth withal) to put them in remembrance of their servile condition, thereby to terrify them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and talking all together with their Whips in their hands, they gave the onset. Which seemed so terrible in the ears of their Villains, and struck such a sense into them of the smart of the Whip, which they had felt before, that they fell all together like Sheep before the Drivers. In memory of this Victory, the Novogorodians ever since have stamped their Coin (which they call a Dingee Novogorodsky, current through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a Whip aloft in his Hand. It may seem, that all the Women of that Country, have fared the worse ever since, in regard of this universal Fault: for such a Padkey or Whip, as terrified those Slaves, curiously wrought by her self, is the first Present that the Asserian Wife, even in time of Wooing, sends to him; that shall be her Husband, in token of subjection; being well assured, to feel it often on her own Loins. But this was a Document unto the Scythians, or rather Sarmatians, (for Novogorod stands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of abetting themselves any more so long from their Wives; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set down of the Scythian Expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to have been a great cause, of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Judea, which continues yet a while the Centre of our Discourse.

S. V.

Of Princes living in divers Countries in those Ages.

HAVING thus far digressed from the matters of Judea, to avoid all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings and Men of Mark, as were between the death of Manasse, and the ruine of Jerusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I have spoken as much, as I thought needful. In Rome, Tullius Hostilius held the Kingdom, until the one and twentieth year of Jesias; at which time Anus Marcius succeeding Reigned four and twenty years. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come Stranger, but very rich, prevailed so far by his graciousness among the people, that he got the Kingdom to himself, disappointing the Sons of Anus, over whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth year of Zedekias, and Reigned eight and thirty years. In this time it was, namely in the second year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedemonians, being thinking them how to be avenged of the Aceadians, who gave succour to the Missians against them in the former War, entered the Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phistia, from whence their Garrisons were soon after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the Race of the Basida made himself Lord of Critium about these times, and governed it in peace thirty years; leaving for Successor his Son Perandrus, one of the seven Sages, but a cruel Tyrant: who among other vile Acts, slew his own Wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian Women stark naked, burning their Apparel, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceive that the wisdom of the Greeks, was not excellent in those days; when such a one as this could be admired as excelling all the Country.

In these times also were Zalencus, and Draco, famous Law givers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The Laws of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to have written them with blood: for he rewarded every every small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soon abrogated, and power given to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Laws of Zalencus were very mild. He forbade any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unless it were when she was Drunk; or to go forth of the Town by Night, unless it were to some Sweet-hearts Bed; or to dress herself up in some immodest bravery, unless it were to inveigle a Lover. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would seem, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the Dispensation. It is noted in this Man as a singular example of justice, that when his own Son had committed Adultery, and was therefore to lose both his Eyes; he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gave one Eye of his own to save the young Man (who also lost one) from utter blindness.

I shall not henceforth need, so far to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the History, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soon fall under the Persians; the Persians, ere long, encounter with the Greeks; the Greeks with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively prefer themselves, in their flourishing Estate; it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befall them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirteen hundred years, which passed between the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Jerusalem, we find little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very near borders. Yet read we of many Kingdoms, that in these many Ages, were erected, and thrown down: as likewise, many memorable Acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any near distance; all which must have been quite omitted, or else reserved unto a very unseasonable rehearsal, had they not been disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the convenience, may pardon the necessity.

S. V.

The oppression of Judea, and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans.

NOW to return to the Jewish Story, from whence we have so far digressed. In the third year of Jehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet living, entred Judea with a great Army, who besieging and forcing Jerusalem, made Jehoiakim his Vassal in despite of Necho that had established him King, and took with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a Child, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he took a part of the Church-Treasures; but staid not to search them thoroughly; for Necho basted to the succour of Jehoiakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonosor in Judea: where in this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himself and his Army, it being a Country of an evil affection towards him; as also far off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian Horse-men in his Army; it was the more wisely done of him, to fall back out of that rough, mountainous, and over-hot Country, into places that were more even and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his Father, happening at the same time, gave him just occasion to return home; and take possession of his own Kingdom, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more unto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so far and to bid him battle, until the New Year came in; which was the fourth of Jehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Necho. In this year the Babylonian lying upon the Bank of Euphrates (his own Territory bounding it on the North-side) attended the arrival of Necho. There, after a revolved contention for Victory, Necho was slain, and his Army remaining forced to save it self, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This Victory Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Egyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Jehoiakim held himself quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Chaldeans the year before; who contented with such profit as he could then readily make, had forbore to lay any Tribute upon Juda. But this cool reverendness of Jehoiakim was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Phamnis, who succeeded unto Necho, began to think upon restoring Jehoiakim, taken Prisoner by his Father, and letting him up, as a Domestical Enemy, against his ungrateful Brother. Against all such accidents, the Judeans had prepared the usual remedy, practised by his Forefathers: for he had made his own Son Jehoiachin a King with him long before, in the second year of his own Reign, when the Boy was but Eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehoiakim's return; the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it should prove idle, saying: He shall not return thither, but he shall die in the place whither they have led him Captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeed, having spent all their Mercenary forces, and received that heavy blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharp Steel, as of fair Gold, which without other help, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Phamnis. Apries who Reigned after Phamnis, did once adventure to shew his face in Syria; but after a bigg look, he was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazard of a battle. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with brave words, telling such frivolous tales, as Men, that meant to do nothing, use, of their glorious Acts forepassed, against Josias and Jehoiakim. In this case it was easy for Jehoiakim to give them satisfaction; by letting them understand, the sincerity of his affection towards them; which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to work more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Jehoiakim, willing him not to stand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himself a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearful threats, as made the poor Judean lay aside all thought of Pharao, and yield to do, as the more mighty would have him. So he continued in the obedience of Nabu-chodonosor for three years. At this time Jeremy the phet cried out against the Jews, putting them in mind that he had now three and twenty years exhorted them to Repentance, but because they had spelt their Ears against him, and the rest of the Prophets, he now pronounced their Captivity at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seventy years. The same calamity he threatened to all the Neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans and the rest: foretelling that they should all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the Wine of His Fury, whom they had forsaken, and after the seventy years expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same Cup, and be utterly subverted by the Medes, and the Judeans permitted to return again into their own Fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Jeremy seems to have been in the fourth year of this Jehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he sent to read them unto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings fury they had first set Jeremy at liberty, and advised him and Baruch to hide themselves.

Jehoiakim after he heard a part of it and perceived the ill news therein delivered, made no more ado but did cut the Book in pieces and cast it into the Fire. All which Jeremy caused to be new written, with this addition; that the dead Body of Jehoiakim, should be cast out, exposed in the day to the Heat, and in the night to the Frost, and that there should be none of his Seed to sit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Jehoiakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonians, yet well thought of by the Egyptians, the mighty City of Tyre opposed it self against the Chaldean Forces; and upon just confidence of her own strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the term of seventy years, was prescribed unto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Jerusalem, and other Towns and Countries, it is apparent, that they which refer the expugnation of this City unto the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, have lost Authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it follows of necessity, that the Siege thereof began in the seventh of his Reign; as having lasted thirteen years.

Here I will take leave to intrude a brief note, concerning the several beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much dispute. The third year of Jehoiakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being delivered from other cares, took notice of such as had revolted from him unto Pharaoh Necho, and sent this Noble Prince, his Son, with an Army into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same year. The year next following, being the fourth of Jehoiakim, was the first of Nabuchadnezzar; which Jeremy affirmeth in express words; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth year he conquered Egypt; and then began to Reign as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this year it was, wherein he saw that Vision, of the Image consisting of sundry Metals; which did prefigure the succession of great Kingdoms, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations: but return unto the Siege of Tyre, which began in the seventh of his Reign.

The City of Tyre covered all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the Main, by a deep and broad Channel of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Seamen; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to use them, excelled all other Nations; and every Wind, from one part or other, brought needful provisions into the City. Wherefore neither Force, nor Famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof nevertheless the Judgments of God (denounced against it by Isaiah, Jeremy, Ezekiel, &c.) had threatened the destruction; and the obdurate resolution of Nabuchodonosor, had fully determined to perform it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, undertook a vast piece of work; even to fill up the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The City of old Tyre, that stood opposite to the new, upon the firm Land, and the Mountain of Libanus near adjoining that was laden with Cedars, and abundance of other Trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteen years were spent, in this laborious, and almost hopeless business. Which needeth not seem strange: for Alexander working upon that Foundation which was remaining of Nabuchodonosor's Peer; and being withal assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seven months ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that wherewith Alexander laboured to cover a Shelf; with much more violence could it overturn, and as it were confound, the work of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his Foundations in the bottom of the deep, striving as it were, to fill the empty Belly of this Cormorant; whereas the Macedonian did only stop the throat of it. Every Man knows, God could have frustrated the accomplishment of his own threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to use, either Miracle, or such of his more immediate Weapons, as are Earth-quakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calm, and adding the favourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of Man, to use the hand of Man; even the hand of Man striving, as may seem, against all resistance of Nature and Fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans, Every hand was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not give over till he was Master of the Town.

When he was entered upon this desperate service; whether it were so, that some Idlers received some mutiny in his Army, or (which is most likely; and so Josephus reports it) some glorious rumors of the Egyptians, gave courage to his evil willers; Jehoiakim renounced his subjection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gave him no leisure to do much hurt: but with part of his Army marched directly into Judea, where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Egyptians having left him, as it were in a dream) that he entered Jerusalem, and laid hands on Jehoiakim: whom he first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing Counsel, he caused him to be slain in the place, and gave him the Sepulchre of an Ass, to be devoured by Beasts and ravenous Birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his place, Jehoiakim or Jechonias his Son; whom after three months and ten days Nabuchodonosor removed and sent Prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Methuselah, and Jedechah, the High Priest. The Mother of Jechonias, together with his Servants, Eunuchs, and all the ablest Men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carried away Captives. This Jechonias, following the Counsel of Jeremy the Prophet, made no resistance, but submitted himself to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himself; though at the present it might seem otherwise, to such as considered the evil that befel him, rather than the greater evil that he thereby avoided. This only particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it seems that he was partaker, at least of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himself to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we read in general words, that he did evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mabbania his Uncle in the Kingdom of Judea, and called him Zedekias, which is as much to say, as the Justice of God. For like as Necho, King of Egypt, had formerly displaced Jehozabab, after his Father Josias was slain, and set up Jehoiakim the Son of another Mother; so Nabuchodonosor slew Jehoiakim who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his Son Jechonias Prisoner to Babel, gave the Kingdom to this Zedekias, that was whole Brother to that Jehozabab, whom Neco took with him into Egypt. From Zedekias he required an Oath for his faithful obedience, which Zedekias gave him, and called the living God to witnesses in the same, that he would remain assured to the Kings of Chaldeas.

In the first year of Zedekias, Jeremy saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Judeans that were carried away Captive, the other those that stayed, and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedekias, Jeremy wrote in a Book all the evil that should fall upon Babylon, which Book or Scroll he gave to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedekias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor; willing him first to read it to the Captive Jews, and then to bind it to a Stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her. The journey of Zedekias to Babel is probably thought to have been in way of Visitation, carrying some Presents. But I further think, that he had some Suit there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his return all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seems) to those unquiet courses, from which Jeremy dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made Bonds and Yokes; one of which he wore about his own Neck, others he sent unto the five Kings of Edom, Moab, Amman, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visit Zedekias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Judea abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possess and enjoy their own Countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the Sword, by Fire, and by Pestilence.

He also foretold them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Jerusalem, should also travel after the rest, and at length they should be restored again.

The same year Ananias, the false Prophet, took off the wooden Chain which Jeremy wore, in sign of the Captivity of the Jews, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two years, God would break the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he laid on all Nations; restore Jechonias, and all the Jews, with the Vessels and Riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Jeremy instead of his wooden Yoke gave a Collar of Iron: and in sign that Ananias had given a deceitful and false hope to the People, he foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which fell upon him in the second month. After this, when Zedekias had wavered long enough between Faith and Passion, in the eighth year of his Reign he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promised great aids of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose assistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian Yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge he marched with his Army in the dead of Winter, toward Jerusalem, and besieged it. Jeremy persuaded Zedekias to render the City and himself: but being confident of the help from Egypt, and being persuaded by his Counsellors, and false Prophets, that it was impossible that the Kingdom of Judea should be extirpate, until the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecy of Isaiah) he despised the words of Jeremy and imprisoned him. For Jeremy had told the King, that the City should be taken and burnt; that the King should be taken, but not be taken Prisoner, and brought to the presence of the King of Babylon; that he should not perish by the Sword, but being carried to Babel, die his natural death.

Jerusalem being, the following year, surrounded by Nabuchodonosor's Army; the King of Egypt, Pharaoh Hophra according to Jeremy (Hovadad call him Apries) entered the border of Judea, with his Army, to succour Zedekias, of whose revolt he had been the principal Author. But Jeremy gave the Jews faithful Counsel, willing them not to have any trust in the succours of Egypt: for he assured them, that they should return again, and in no sort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans removed from Jerusalem to encounter the Egyptian, their vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leaving the poor People of Jerusalem to their destined miseries.

In the mean while the Jews, who, in their first extremity, had manumitted their Hebrew Bonds-men (as Gods Law required at the year of Jubilee) and made them Free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now upon the breaking up of the Chaldean Army, repent them of their Charity: and tinking all had been at an end, held them perforce to their former slavery. But the Chaldeans being returned to the Siege, the

Of the time passing between the Destruction of Jerusalem, and the Fall of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of the connexion of Sacred and Profane History.

THE course of Time; which in Profane Histories might rather be discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some outworn foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Eastern Countries by the account from Nabonassar, left surer marks, and more applicable to actions concurrent, than were the War of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Jerusalem to discover the connexion of Antiquity fore-spent, with the Story of succeeding Ages. Manifest it is, that the original and progress of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first Creation: as likewise that the Affairs of Kingdoms and Empire afterwards grown up are not to be found among those, that have now no state nor policy remaining of their own. Having therefore pursued the Story of the World unto that Age, from whence the memory of succeeding accidents is with little interruption or fabulous discourse derived unto us,

[Bbb]

I hold

I hold it now convenient briefly to shew, by what means and circumstances the History of the Hebrews, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conjoined with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry Metals, discovered by God unto Nabuchadnezzar, did Reign over the Earth, when Israel was either none, or an unregarded Nation.

Herein I do not hold it needful, to insist upon those Authorities, which give, as it were by hearsay, a certain Year of some old Assyrian King unsay, to some action or event, whereof the time is found expresse in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his Line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his issue that occupied that Kingdom afterwards, depending upon the uncertain relations of such, as were neither constant in assigning the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to rely upon. Let it therefore suffice, that the consent and harmony, which some have found in the years of those over-worn Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might have been forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true that we find the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by Prophane Historians, yet hereby could we only learn in what age each of them lived, but not in what year their Reign began or ended, were it not that the Reign of Nabuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Jehoiakim and Zedekia. Hence have we the first light whereby to discover the means of connecting the Sacred and Prophane Histories. For under Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the Captivity of Juda, which ended when 70 years were expired; and these 70 years took end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well known affords us means of looking back into the Ages past, and forwards into the Race of Men succeeding. The first year of Cyrus his Reign in Persia, by general consent, is joined with the first year of the 55. Olympiads, where, that he reigned three and twenty years before his Monarchy, and seven years afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controversy. Giving therefore four hundred and eight years unto the distance between the fall of Troy, and the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus; we may easily arrive unto those Antiquities of Greece, which were not merely fabulous. As for Princes, ruling the whilst in sundry parts of the World, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting down their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved Faith and Industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned unto Alexander, and from him to the Battle of Albium, which was (peradventure) in this place impertinent to be set down. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian Captivity are the marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first unto the latest interruption, it is very through any Story, with least interruption, it is very expedient that we take some pains to inform our selves truly of the 70 years, during which it continued, even from Nabuchadnezzar unto Cyrus.

§. II.

A brief rehearsal of two Opinions, touching the beginning of the Captivity: with an Answer to the cavils of Porphyry, insinuating against S. Matthew, and Daniel, upon whom the later of these Opinions is founded.

Many Commentators, and other Historians, and Chronologers find, that the Captivity then began when Jechonias was carried Prisoner into Babylon, eleven years before the final destruction of Jerusalem under Zedekia. This they prove out of divers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth Chapter, where he makes a plain distinction between the beginning of the Captivity, and utter destruction of Jerusalem by Nabuchadnezzar, in these words: In the five and twentieth year of our being in captivity in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the City was smitten. In which words he beginneth the Captivity in plain terms, eleven years before the City was destroyed. Berosus is of opinion that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Josiah, which he endeavours to prove out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of S. Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of long dispute, but serve not to make good so much as Berosus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole Book of Daniel, have manifested occasions of scoffing and railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched Man Porphyry, who, not understanding how the Sons of King Josiah were understood by divers names, as Euphrosimus hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the Sons, or, according to some Translations, the Son and Nephews of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captivity. Upon Daniel also the same Porphyry doth spend the twelfth of his malicious Books written against the Christians, affirming that these Prophecies and Visions remembered by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or near the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the seventy Interpreters who converted the Old Testament about an hundred years before Epiphanes, did also turn this Book of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greek, as a part of Scripture received. And were there any other Argument to confound Porphyry, than that of Alexander Macedon, who was sufficient, who lived divers years before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Jaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conqueror, when he came towards Jerusalem to have Is. 46. destroyed it, this Book of Daniel, wherein he beheld his own glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded unto him; which not only staid his hand from the harm of that City and People, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future peril and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Eastern Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

It is true indeed that the Jews themselves give less Authority to Daniel, than to Moses, and the Prophets, accounting his Book among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or Holy Writings, which they say Eldars and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their return from Babylon.

But first, that the Book of Daniel (I mean so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonical: Secondly, that it was written by Daniel himself, and not by Eldars and the Seniors; we may assure our selves by testimony of Councils, and Fathers. For in the Council of Laodicea held about the year of our Lord 368 after the death of Jovianus the Emperor, and after the Nicene Council three and forty years, this Book of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonical Scriptures, as in the Epistle of the same Council it may be seen, and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witness Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, the fourth Book, and five and twentieth Chapter, so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonical Books upon Origen, so doth Hilarius in his Preface upon the Psalms, and Epiphanius in his Book of Weights and Measures, &c. To these I may add S. Hierom, Gregory Nazianzen, and others. For the Hagiographa Books or Holy Writings the Jews and Rabbins reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Ezra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Eldars, that wrote this Book, Gods commandment unto him by his Angel, to seal up the same to the time appointed, is an unanswerable testimony. Yea that which exceedeth all strength of other proof, our Saviour Christ who citeth no Apocryphal Scripture, in Matthew and Mark, alledgeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his nineteenth Chapter. Further, in the fifth of John, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. S. Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Revelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniel's visions.

§. III.

That the 70 years of Captivity are to be numbered from the destruction of Jerusalem; not from the migration of Jechonias.

Having thus far digressed, in maintaining that Authority, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now convenient, that we return unto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70 years. Neither will I stand to trouble my self and others with laying open the grounds or weakness of that which Eusebius and some few nameless Authors, have sometimes held in this point, which is lately revived by Berosus; but will forth-with enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers have so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Juda were carried away Captives to Babylon: First Manasse; then Jehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly Jechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias, at which time the City and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these Captivities the beginning of the 70 years is referred by none that I have read; to the second by few and with weak proof; to the third by very many with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Jeremy, which may seem to make the matter plain. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Jechonias, useth these words. Thus saith the Lord: After 70 years be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to return to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seek the interpretation of a Prophecy out of circumstances, when the Prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it self. Jeremy had already in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, denounced the judgment of God against the Land, for the sins and impiety of that obstinate people, in these words. Behold, I will send and take to me all the Families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nabuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my Servant; and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continual desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the Bridegroom, and the voice of the Bride, the noise of the Mill-stones, and the light of the Candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel 70 years. And when 70 years are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here we see prescribed unto the Captivity the term of 70 years, which were to commence, neither when the Prophecy was uttered; nor when Jehoiakim, who then Reigned, was taken by Nabuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Jechonias; but with the utter desolation of the City, whereof Jeremy did again give notice to those that were already in Babylon: at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearsed. And so did the people understand this Prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70 years at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the History of Juda, where it is laid thus. They burnt the house of God, of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and they burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious Vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were Servants to him and to his sons, until the Kingdom of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the days that the lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70 years. But in the first year of Cyrus King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah, was fulfilled) the Lord stirred up the Spirit of Cyrus. We seldom find one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this Prophecy, to have afterwards been the subject of altercation. For one can hardly devise, how either the desolation could have been expresse more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the Prophecy have been more exactly foretold, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proof in to evidence a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yields testimony sufficient, unto this exposition of Jeremiah his Prophecy, that Jerusalem was to lie wast 70 years. For in the first year of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70 Daniel obtained of God the deliverance that had been promised by Prayer, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth us in these words. In the fifth year of his Reign, I Daniel understood by Books the number of the years, whereof the Lord had spoken unto Jeremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70 years in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that howsoever the time of Daniel's own Captivity be reckoned from the taking of Jehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Jechonias, did account, as well they might, the years of their own Captivity; yet with the general desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabit, began in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor the great Captivity, which by Gods appointment continued unto the end of 70. years. This I will not further seek to prove, by the Authority of Tolsephus and others affirming the same; forasmuch as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfy any Man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

§. IV.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70 years.

What Kings reigned in Babylon, during these 70 years of the Captivity, and how long each of them did wear the Diadem, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the Age where in they lived, nor the length of their Reigns any way helpful to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding. The Conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seem fruits of the Victories obtained by Nabuchodonosor the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betook himself to ease, and to the sumptuous Building of his great Babel, for the House of his Kingdom, and for the honour of his Majesty, where it may seem that he and his Heirs kept a great State, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Soldiers, in such Skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no less. For whereas under Nabuchodonosor, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofs) they attempted, and finished, that hardy piece of Work, of winning the strong City of Tyrr, by joyning it unto the Continent, siling up the deep and broad Channel of the Sea, dividing it from the Main with a Mole, or Peir of Earth, and other matter, the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexander's Works in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the Enemy than their Bows would carry, but were ready to turn their backs, as soon as any, though inferior in numbers, adventuring within the distance offered to charge them.

Now as their actions, from the end of Nabuchodonosor's Wars, till the ruin of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and Reign of their several Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath in vain been taken in that business. For when it is granted, that the Captivity of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70 years, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three foolish Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their Children, living in the Assyrian servitude; resting satisfied in both with the general allured sum.

Yet for as much as many have travelled in this business, upon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the 70 years, not only by the Reigns of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves: I will not refuse to take a little pains in collecting their Opinions, and shewing what I think, may best be held for likely, if the certain truth cannot be found.

The Opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting down the years of their several Reigns. The first (as I take it) the first, is theirs, who merely follow the Authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any help from others. These name only three Kings, Nabuchodonosor, Evilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither have they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the Prophecy of Jeremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very fame. For God, by the Mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all would dispose of all, according to his own Will, and making it known that he had some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serve him, and his Son, and his Sons Son, until the very time of his land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serve themselves of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I find no other necessity of qualification to be used herein than such as may grow out of Mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures unto Prophane Authors. And this desire were not unjust, if the content of all Histories were on the one side, and the Letter of the Holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofs of their different reports are so slender and insufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not been thus delivered in Scriptures, but only set down by some Author of equal credit with the rest, might very well have found and deserved as good belief, as any of those things which they have delivered in this case. For some there are, who following Tolsephus, derive that Empire, as by descent from father to son, through five Generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the Great, and giving to him 43 years, to Evilmerodach 18, to Niglissar the Son of Evilmerodach 40, to Labofardach the Son of Niglissar 9 months, and lastly to Balthasar (whom Tolsephus intimates to be of the Race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his Father) 17 years. And this Opinion (save that he forbears to reckon the years, and plainly calls Balthasar the Son of Labofardach) Saint Jerome doth follow, alleging Berosus, and Tolsephus as a Scriptor of Berosus for his Authors; though Berosus, as he is cited by Tolsephus, report the matter far otherwise. For he tells us that Evilmerodach the Son of Nabuchodonosor did Reign but two years, being for his wickedness and lust, slain by his Sisters Husband Niglissar, who occupied the Kingdom after him four years, and left it to his own Son Labofardach, who being an ill-conditioned Boy, was at the end of nine months slain by such as were about him, and the Kingdom given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it unto Cyrus after 17 years. This relation ill agrees with that of Tolsephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of Years, or of Generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured unto them some Authority, so that the Names which they have inferred, are taken as it were upon Trust. There is a third opinion, which makes the three last Kings Brethren, and Sons of Evilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather believe Xenophon, who saith that the last King of Babylon was immediate Successor to his Father. But whereas the Author of the Scholastical History, who is founder of this Opinion, placeth between him that took Jerusalem, and Evilmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plain it is that he hath, out of any History sacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpicius Severus, and Theodoret, upon better ground, have supposed, that Evilmerodach and Balthasar were Brethren and Sons of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Evilmerodach there is none that ever doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his Son. And so common grew this Explication, that Saint Jerome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremy before cited, proves that Balthasar was not the Son indeed, but the Grand-child of that great Conquerour, though by the Phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eastern Languages, he was called the Son.

Amnius his Metaphisus his very rightly the seventy years of captivity, giving to Nabuchodonosor 43 years, to Evilmerodach 30 years, and to the three Sons of Evilmerodach, Nephews of Nabuchodonosor 14 years; that is, to Reg-Aster the eldest Son three years, to Lab-Aster the second Son six years, and to Balthasar the third Son five.

To this Account agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole sum of years, and in the number of Generations, I have sometime subscribed, as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, upon no greater reason than because the Author was of Amnius his edition. Yet could I not satisfy my self herein; both for that none of the ancient, and few such of the modern Writers as deserve to be regarded, have consented with Metaphisus; and for that in making Balthasar to succeed unto his Brother in the Kingdom, and not unto his Father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose History of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian War I cannot slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the King was at his drunken Feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all Circumstances that might give any light in this obscurity, I found manifest proof, that the time allotted unto Balthasar, by Amnius his Metaphisus, was far short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70 years he pleased among the reft. For in the third year of Balthasar, Daniel saw a Vision, after which he was sick certain days, but when he recovered he did the Kings Business: from which Business, that he did afterwards withdraw himself, and live retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queen used to set out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel. Now to think that a Man of such Account and Place as Daniel had held, could in two years have been worn out of remembrance, were in my Judgment a very strange Conceit, which rather than I would entertain, I can well be contented, to think the whole Story (thus related) a part of Amnius his Importunities.

Out of these Reports of Tolsephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by con-jectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the Captivity being 70 years, and these years extending unto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nabuchodonosor, his Son and Grand-child, must have reigned; it hath seemed needful to supply the years of these three defects, by inferring some whose Reigns might fill up the whole continuance of the Captivity, with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Evilmerodach and Balthasar, joyned unto the years following the nineteenth of Nabuchodonosor, (wherein Jerusalem was laid desolate) are nothing even.

Therefore Metaphisus and others following him, fashion the years of Evilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18 years given to him by Tolsephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbered 28 years, and the two years that Berosus hath allowed to Evilmerodach should be written 23: in the first number the figure of [1] is mistaken for the figure of [2] and in the latter there should have been added the figure of [3] to that of [2]: this granted [to wit] that Evilmerodach reigned 28 years, whereof five together with his Father, and 23 after his death, and the same number of 23 added to the 25 which Nabuchodonosor lived after the destruction of Jerusalem, make 49, then 4 years of Niglissar according to Berosus, 9 Months of Labofardach his Son, and 17 years of Nabonidus or Balthasar make up the number of 70 years to the first of Cyrus. But whether by Error in Figures, or in Words, the Numbers be utterly mistaken, in all Copies extant; upon how weak a foundation do they build, who have nothing to help them, save only the bare Names of two unknown Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy, to have that place of Jeremy called into dispute, in regard of their Authority?

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the Number, Persons, and Reigns of the Babylonian Kings.

Other suppositions, little different in substance from this of Metaphisus, I purposely forbear to rehearse, as falling under the same Answer. That of Tolsephus Scaliger I may not forget, as deserving to be considered apart from the rest. He gives to Nabuchodonosor 44 years, to Evilmerodach 2, to Balthasar, 5; and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19 of Nabuchodonosor, in which Jerusalem was destroyed, unto the time of Cyrus he accompteth only 30 years; beginning as (many do) the Captivity 11 years sooner, from the Transportation of Jechonia. But hereof enough hath been said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19 of Nabuchodonosor, and the fall of the Chaldean Empire: wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquisition frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchodonosor's Reign, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliver my opinion. The time which he gives to Evilmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we find in Jeremy, that this Evilmerodach in the first of his Reign, shewing all favour to Jechonia, did among other things take order for him at his Table; and that he did continually eat Bread before him all the days of his life. His Portion was a continual Portion given him of the King of Babel, every day a certain; all the days of his life until he died. The very found of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than the Authority of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a far longer time than two years, wherein Jeconiah, under this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort fed by God, whose Commandment he had obeyed in yielding himself to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Jeconiah did live it cannot be proved; but plain it is hereby that all his remaining days he eat Bread before this King. Now that he lived not so short a while after this as two years, it is more than likely, for he was but 53 years old when he was put in liberty, having been 37 years in the Prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18 years; after which time it seems plain that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zerobabel, who is said to have been but a young Man, and one of Darius his Pages threefore years after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it self.

Of Belshazzar, to whom Scaliger gives the next five years, naming him also Laborodach, I should wonder why he calls him Nabuchadnezzar's Daughters Son, were it not that herein I find him very careful to help out Berosus, by shifting in his Nightfleeper, as Husband to Nabuchadnezzar's Daughter, and Protector of his Son four of these years; by which means there remains about one year to Belshazzar alone, agreeing nearly with the 9 months assigned by Berosus to the Son of Niglissar. But Jeremy hath told us that it was to Nabuchadnezzar, and to his Son, and to his Sons Son (not to his Daughters Son) that the Empire was promised: which difficulty if Scaliger could not help, it was well done of him, to pass it over with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthazar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firm Berosian: for Berosus makes him of the same Stock or Race a Babylonian. I speak not this to disgrace the Travel of that most learned Man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgment, that he was not so wedded to any Author, as affected with the love of truth) but to shew that he himself having in some points disliked those Writers, whom in general he approveth, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirm this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the Phrase of Scripture, which signifies unto us, that Darius took the Kingdom, not saying that he won it by force of Arms. Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Original, or of the Greek Translation, which expressing no force of Arms doth only signify, that Darius took or received the Kingdom; I see no reason why we should thereupon infer, that the next King entered by Election: seeing Daniel relateeth not the means and circumstances of Balthazar's death, but only the swift accomplishment of his own Prophecy. Neither could it indeed have properly been said (if Daniel had cause to use the most expressive terms) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the City, did win the Kingdom; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his Forces, and to his use. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his Works printed at Basil, in the year 1559. I find only thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alphibius, That Nabuchadnezzar was more valiant than Hercules; that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia as far (as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his Kingdom, and rapt with a Divine fury, he cried with a loud voice, O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great Calamity that shall come upon you, which neither Bel, nor any of the Gods shall avert: There will come a Persian, half an Ass, that shall bring Levery upon ye: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I believe little or nothing, faving that Nabuchadnezzar was before hand, that his Empire should be trampled, as Daniel had foretold from the Golden Head, to the Silver Breast. But that he won all Africa or Lybia, I hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaliger's Copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells us that Nabuchadnezzar won both Africa and Spain, I believe the fragment to much the leis: and am as little moved with the Authority of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Assyrians, as where it tells of Nabuchadnezzar his own vanishing away. Indeed that fame Title of half an Ass, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his Parentage was more Noble on the Mothers side, than on the Fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses upon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principal Foundations whereon this Opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it hath within it self, I easily allow it. But this proves nothing, for men fictions have not wanted these commendations: neither can any Man believe that one so judicious, industrious and deeply learned as Joseph Scaliger, would over-throw himself in setting down repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeal. And herein it seems that Scaliger, well knowing his own insufficiency, hath been little careful to satisfy Men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the Prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdom of Babylonia was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians, either we must think that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else we must believe our selves what Persian it might be that shared the Kingdom with him. For it is not more certain, that Balthazar lost his Life and Kingdom, than that his Kingdom was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to have been Darius, they should be thought to have done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the subject Provinces, inasmuch that the Greek Historians did commonly call those Wars which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made upon Greece, The Wars of the Medes. Yea to clear this point, even Daniel himself resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, unto a Ram with two Horns, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Joseph Scaliger, for maintaining upon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was Partner with with Cyrus in his Victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Josephus to be the less regarded for affirming that Balthazar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Neighbours Cyrus, though herein he varied from Berosus, and others, whose Authority elsewhere he gladly cieth. For Josephus had no reason to believe any Mans Faith or Knowledge of those times, half so well as Daniel's, whom I believe that he understood as far as was needful in this case. Lawful it was for him to alledge all Authors that had any mention, though imperfect of the same things that were contained in the Writings of the Jews, to whose Histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman World, where they were Strangers, and might seem fabulous. Even so do Eusebius, and other Christian Writers, willingly embrace the Testimonies of Heathen Books making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in general by the self-same Ethnick Philosophers, but leave them where they are against the truth; as Josephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of Scaliger's Opinion in this point; holding nevertheless in due regard his Learning and Judgment, which if in some things it had not failed, the Miracle had been very great.

§. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his Successors.

It now remains that I freely acknowledge mine own weakness, who cannot find how the 70 years of Captivity are to be divided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I find that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the Holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Petrus, that we ought liberally to pardon those whose Feet have failed them in the slippery ways of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedless reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliver my Opinion, wherein the Judgment of Lyra and others (holding those only to have reigned over Chaldeans, whose names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Conjectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Conjectures, when he supposeth by Niglissar and Laborodach to be meant the same Persons which are called in Scriptures Evimerodach and Balthazar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but only to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of seventy years. First therefore let us consider the Reign of Nabuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth year Jerusalem was taken and sacked, but in his nineteenth laid utterly desolate.

Most of Writers have given to him 43 years of Reign, following therein Berosus. There are who have added one year more; and some have made it up 45. To dispute about the certainty were needless: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certain truth.

Manifest it is, that the 19 year of Nabuchadnezzar, is joynted with the 11 of Zedekia; as also that his eighth year, was the first year of Jeconiah his Captivity; the Reign of Zedekia occupied all the mean space being of 11 years. This is generally agreed upon, so that it needs no further proofs. As for the beginning of his Succellor Evimerodach, it was in the seven and thirtieth year of Jeconiah his Captivity; so that Nabuchadnezzar after his eighth year (which was the first of Jeconiah his bondage) reigned 33 whole years, and peradventure a good part of the fix and thirtieth, forasmuch as Jeconiah was enlarged with so great favour, not until the end of the year. Subtracting therefore out of these four and forty, which Nabuchadnezzar's Reign did well-near occupy, those eighteen years of his which passed away before the Captivity of Juda, and ruin of the city, we have remaining fix and twenty years of the seventy, that were almost wholly spent, when his Son began to Reign.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the seventy years were divided between the Kings ruling in Babylon until the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needful: the whole sum being certain, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were lustful Princes. Neither can any Man the more justly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70 years; for that the distribution of some part of them is only conjectural; seeing that none who gives any other terms to their beginning or end, hath required to follow both unlikely and separate conjectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to do as others have done; knowing well before hand, that whosoever shall discover my error, must do me the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more material) of making me to understand the truth.

Of the four and forty years remaining in account at Nabuchadnezzar's death. we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then having Authority good enough to warrant us from blame of presumption, in giving us seventeen years to Balthazar, we find left in our hands to bestow upon Evimerodach fix and twenty years. Of the year belonging to Darius the Mede I have already spoken what I thought sufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this Captivity. That Balthazar did Reign seventeen years, we have the Authority of Josephus, before cited in express words; we have also the general consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who reigned so long; and Balthazar to have been one. But nothing moveth me so much to believe this Tradition, as first those evident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third year of Balthazar he followed the Kings business, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his Reign, (a year sufficient of no few years, passing under this Man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniel's employments took end either that year or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his Wars against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this Man's Father, and being always prosperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time, though we make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the midway. I have already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible that the Reign of Evimerodach was not short: and that Men of Great Judgment have found it most probable that he was King three and twenty years. More, I think, they would have allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that Books of such Antiquity, Antiquity, as those of Berofus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yield in many dark passages of Antiquity. I will yet confess, that were his Works never so excellent, and in all things else unquestionably true, I would not therefore conclude them to be in some one point, where the Scriptures were his open Enemy. How much less ought I to obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seven or eight Lines, and part even of the 1st corrupted, as they believe that follow him in the rest? The Scribes have told us that God gave the Empire to Nabonidus, to his son, and to his Sons Son: How long each of them held it, we find not expressed; yet would we gladly know it of Berofus, or of any other that would teach us; provided always, that helping us in a particularity, he desired not thereby the general Truth. More words are needless. It is enough to say with others, that Berofus or Tolsephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelessness of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to err in writing two for six and twenty, as for three and twenty, or perhaps more easie. For the omission of the second Figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character β (that stands for 2, than hath γ which is used for 3. So that the numeral Notes β & γ expressing 26, were not far enough from being mistaken in the true Copy, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked Hand, or other mischance not unusual, had omitted the first stroke of the former Letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to be not two different Figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in $\beta\gamma$ standing for 23, I do not well perceive. As for the Arithmetical Figure α now in use, they were long after the time of Tolsephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore do not appertain to this Bufileis; unless we should guess that his Works were corrupted in that unlearned Age, which following the Saracens Conquest, was little occupied in the Studies of Humanity, but in a sort wholly given over to the Doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to make Berofus our Friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the favour of his Authority, by forsaking Jeremy and Daniel; when they seem his opposites.

Of the Victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained between the Destruction of Jerusalem and Conquest of Egypt.

W^Hilst Actions this time of 70 years was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in Record. Which may peradventure have been some cause that the time it self was and is yet thought to be abridged, as not having left sufficient matter to witness the length of it. But by such an Argument we might as well deny to many People even their being. For every Nation (I know not how I should excuse) between the beginning and last end of it, hath in some foolish Age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no marvel, if the Posterity of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could have desired, betook themselves to their Ease and Pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigal Sons of greedy Fathers, their own wildom greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their An-efforts, which wearied away their days in the reflections of purchasing. Though indeed the Reign of Nebuchadnezzar was so divided, that his youthful and stronger years having been exercised in Victorious Arms, do small part of his Life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthy Labours past. The nineteenth year of his Reign it was, when destroying utterly the great and mighty City of Tersalem, he enriched himself with abundance of Spoil, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearful example. From that time forward, until his three and twentieth year, he laboured in the Conquest of those adjoining Regions, which God had exalted unto his Sword, and commanded to wear his Yoke; namely the Edemites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidonites, and Egyptians, though none of these were already become his followers, Tersalem and his when Tersalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians and Sidonians City was founded on an Island, free from any danger of a Land-Army, and whose Fleet was so strong that they needed not to fear any Enemy at Sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their Neighbour Cities, nor with the obnoxious Resolution of this mighty Prince, imploving all his Power to their subversion.

That the City of Tyre was rather well pleased than any way discomfited with the fall of Jerusalem (which had held the same course that Tyre did, and endured all that might be in the same Quarrel against the common Enemy) it appears by the words which Ezekiel commendeth as the common Voice of Tyrrus; Alas, the Gate of the People is broken, it is turned unto me; for seeing life is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at the length, even in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, that great Work of his, whereof we have already spoken, began to appear above the Waters, and threaten them with inevitable mischief.

But those Prophecies of Jeremy and of Ezkey, which appoint unto this defolation of Tyre the same term of 70 years, that was prescribed unto the Reign of the Chaldeans, do plainly shew, that the following Jerusalem, the same nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like Fortune. The Particularities which doublet: were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a Siege, are in a manner utterly off. Thus much we find, that the Citizens perceiving the Town unable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus. Nevertheless it seems that this evasion served only the principal Men, who escaping with their Goods, abandoned the poorer sort unto the Enemies fury. For not only such People of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her English in the Field) were put to the Sword; but the like execution was done in the Islands, into which with excessive Labour the Affrican made way for his Horses and Chariots.
Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Army to serve a service against Tyre, wherein every head was made bald, and every Shoulder was made bare, yet had no wages, nor his Army, but was fain to rest contented with the Honour of having destroyed that City, which in all Mens Judgments had been held invincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerful Cities, having made the Name of the Chaldeans dreadful in the Ears of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor used the advantage of that Reputation which he had obtained by Victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable with less pain. The Kingdom of Egypt was the Mark at which he aimed; a Country to abound in all Riches and Pleasures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himself strong enough to bear the yoke of Quarrel against it; and so far an Enemy to the Crown of Babylon; that and it been poorer, yet either it must have been subdued, or the Conquest of Syria could ill have been established. Nevertheless it was needful that before he entered into this Buile, the Countries adjacent should be reduced into such terms, that either they should wholly stand at his devotion, or at least be unable to work him any displeasure. And herein the Decree of God was concurred, as in all prosperous Enterprises, with Reason of State. For the People of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, and other adjoining Regions, whom God for their sins had condemned to fall under the Babylonian Swords, were such, as regarding only their own Gain, had some of them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldean Army, to feed upon the Carcasses that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking advantage of their Neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his Victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor; all of them thinking, that when the Affrivan had satisfied his Fury, he should be fain to forsake those desolate parts, and leave the possession to those that could lay hand upon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistims had shewed much malice to the Jews when their City was taken. What good Service they had done to the Chaldeans, I find not; if they did any, it is likely to have been with reference to their own Purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoyce at the fall of Jerusalem, but presently they entered upon the Country of Gad, and took possession, as if now the Affrivan, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceive what other ground that Practice had of Banish King of the Ammonites when he sent Ismael, a Prince of the Blood of Judah, to murder Gedaliah, whom the King of Babel had left Governour over those that remained in Israel, and to carry captive into the Ammonites Country the People that abode in asaph, with no more than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many Labours at once, as should make him retire into his own Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himself and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like Policy the Ammonites did exercise; whose Pride and Wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these Nations had the Art of Ravening, which is familiar to such as live or border upon Defarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the uttermost cunning of their thievish Wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut afunder all their Devices by sharp and sudden War; overwhelming them with unexpected Ruine, as it were in one Night; according to the Prophecies of Ejaj, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, who fore-told with little difference of words, the greatness and swiftness of the Mилery that should come upon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seems that Moad was the last which felt his hand: for so do many good Authors interpret the Prophecy of Ejaj, threatening Moad with destruction after three years, as having reference to the third year following the Ruine of Jerusalem; the next year after it being the Ruine of the Ægyptian Expedition. This is manifest, that all the principal Towns of these Regions were burnt, and the People slain, or made Slaves, few excepted, who began preleried by Flight, had not the courage to return to their Habitacions over-hastily, much less to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but lived as miserable Out-Laws, or at least oppressed Wretches, until the end of the seventy years, which God had prescribed unto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Juda.

• VIII:

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slain by Nabuchodonolor, contrary to the Opinion of most Authors; who following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

WHEN by a long course of Victory Nabuchodonosor had brought unto subjection all the Nations of Syria and the bowing down of them in such manner as he himself, now Friend of the Aegyptians, was lately at his Back, that might give impediment unto his proceeding; or take advantage of any misfortune; then did he forthwith take in hand the Conquest of Aegypt himself, upon which those other Nations had formerly been depending. Of this Expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, have written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needless to look after more Authority, or to cite for Proof of fact that which may be alleged out of these. Nevertheless we find many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to strain these Prophecies with unreasonable dilgence unto such a Sense, as gives to Nabuchodonosor little more than the Honour of having done some spoil in Aegypt, omitting the Conquest of that Land by the Babylonian; and referring the death of Apries or Hephra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affairs. So preposterous is the delight which many Men take in the means and second helps conducing to their Purpose, that often-times they prefer the Commentator before the Author; and to up-hold a Sentence giving Tellimony to one Clause, do carefully overthrow the History it self, which thereby they sought to have maintained. The Reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Aegypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former Book: but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely reserved till this place. Herodotus affirms that he was a very fortunate King, but whose exact tellings are false (unless we should understand that he was victorious in the War which he said to have made upon Tyrus and Sidon) that he reigned five and twenty years, and was finally taken and put to death by his own Subjects; who did let up Amasis, as King, which prevailed against him. The Rebellion of the Aegyptians he imputeth to a great Loaf which they received in an Expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Army was destroyed. This calamity the People of Aegypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous Expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed, that so he might with greater security reign over such as lay dead at home. So they who escaped, and the Friends of such as were slain, rebelled against Apries, who lent Amasis to appease the Tumult; but Amasis became Captain of the Rebels, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented unto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust unto his foreign Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept in readiness thirty thousand good Souldiers, that fought valiantly for him, but were vanquished by the great numbers of the Egyptian Forces, amounting unto two hundred and fifty thousand, which were all by Birth and Education, Men of War. Amasis himself being taken Prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, until the Egyptians exclaiming upon him as an extreme Enemy to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and frangled him; yet gave him Honourable Buriall. Such is the Report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus nearly agrees, telling us that Amasis did vanquish the Cyprians and Phoenicians in Battel at Sea, took by force and demolished Sidon, was the other Towns of Phoenicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned two and twenty years. This Authority were enough (yet not more than enough) to inform us of Amasis his History, if greater Authority did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonians, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no concurrence with these Relations, hath greater force to compel our Belief, than have the Traditions of Egyptian Priests (which Greek Historians followed) and greater Probabilities to persuade those that look only into Humane Reasons. For Ezay prophesied long before of the shameful Captivity of the Egyptians, whom the King of Ashur should carry away naked, young and old, in such wild that the Jews who fled unto them for deliverance from the Affrian, should be ashamed of their own vain confidence in Men so unable to defend themselves.

But Ezekiel and Jeremy, as their Prophecies were nearer to the time of execution, for they handled this Argument more precisely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should be given to Nabuchadnezzar, as Wages for the Service which he had done at Tyre: Also he recounteth particularly all the chief Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by Name should be destroyed and go into captivity; yea, that Pharaoh and all his Army should be slain by the Swords. Wherefore it must needs be a violent Expolition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such Threatenings to an Infurrection and Rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings Person, wherein Amasis did succeed unto Amasis, by force indeed, but by the uniform Consent of all the People. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein he foretelleth how the Jews in Egypt should fee Pharaoh Hophra delivered into the hand of his Enemies, as Zedekiah had been, were to be referred unto the time of that Rebellion whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the general Opinion hath over-ruled it, then was it vainly done of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should think, seeing he did it by the appointment of God himself) to hide in the Clay of a Brick-hill, those very Stones, upon which the Throne of Nabuchadnezzar should be set, and his Pavilion spread. Yea then was that Prophecy no other than false, which exprest the end of Pharaoh thus. Behold, I will visit the common People of No, and Pharaoh and Egypt, with their Gods and their Kings, even Pharaoh, and all that Jerem. 45. trust in him: and I will deliver them into the hands of 23. 26. those that seek their lives, and into the hands of his Servants. The clearness of this Prophecy being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the Rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greek Historians. Wherefore looking upon Tacitus, who had in another place taken the Enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amasis, and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests upon a vain-glorious Purpose of hiding their own Disgrace and Bondage. And surely it may well be thought, that the History of Nabuchadnezzar was better known to the Jews whom it concerned, than to the Greeks that scarcely at any time heard of his Name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather believe Josephus, reporting that Nabuchadnezzar in the three and twentieth year of his Reign, and the fifth year of the destruction of Jerusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodorus; who being mere strangers to this Business had no greater reason to labour in teaching out the Truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all advantage of Authority, we should only consider the Relations of Josephus, and of the Greek Historians, as either of them might be verified of it self by apparent Circumstances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophecies or Egyptian Priests, me thinks the death of Amasis can no way be approved as having been wrought by consent of the People, but affords great matter of suspicion; yea though no Man had opposed the Reports of Herodotus and Diodorus. For the great Love and Honour which the Egyptians did bear unto their Kings, is notorious by the uniform Testimony of all others that have handled the matters of that Country, as well as by the Report of Diodorus himself. How then can we think it probable, that Amasis having won great Victories, did for one only loss fall into the hatred of all his People, or which may serve to persuade us, that a King of Egypt would seek, or do demean himself, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his natural Subjects? As for that Army of thirty thousand Souldiers Carians and Ionians, which the King of Egypt whom Amasis took Prisoner, is said to have kept for his Defence: doth it not argue that he was a Foreigner, and one that armed himself against the Egyptians, withing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their own, as the strength of their own Bodies? it were more tedious than any way needful, to use all Arguments that might be alledged in this Case. The very death of this supposed Amasis, which the clamours of the People obtained of Amasis, who fought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that he was some Foreign Governor, not a natural Prince; otherwise the People would have desired to save his Life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not have yielded, though it had stood upon great appearance of Truth, considering that the voice of Truth it self cries out against it; but leave the Circumstances proving the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchadnezzar to be observed, where due occasion in course of the Story following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nebuchadnezzar.

IT is a great loss, that the general History of the World hath suffered, by the spoil and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should have preserved the memory of such famous Actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nabuchadnezzar; wherein, whether his Virtue, or Fortune were greater, it is now uncertain. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all his former Wars had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel: who reckons up in his thirtieth Chapter (besides the whole Country of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seem to have reached out into Mauritania, as People subdued by these Wars arc in a manner utterly lost; but that the Victory was easy and swift, any Man shall find, who will take the pains to confer the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I think worthy of more particular observation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Book) thought himself safe in Egypt by the well defended situation of his Country, did very unwilfully in suffering his Enemies to sweep the way clean unto his own doors, by confining all his Friends and Adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this Business did more harden than weary the Chaldean Army, so the confidence and vain security of the Egyptians, relying upon the difficult passages which the Enemy was to make through the Arabian Deserts, and the much advantage which the great River of Nilus would afford unto themselves, did little avail them in Provision for the War, and much afterwards them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being usually seen, that the Hearts of Men fail, when those Helps fail, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their own Virtue. Hitherto the Kingdom of Egypt had flourished under the Rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand and five hundred and forty years; but from this time forward it remained forty years without a King, under the subjection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatness, yet, that it was never dreadful unto others, God having said of that People, I will diminish them that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath been said of Pharaoh: I am the Son of the Wife, I am the Son of the ancient Kings; and whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Egypt now became Fools, the River failed them, the King himself was taken and slain, and that ancient Linage quite extinguished. This came to pass in the first year after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the three and twentieth year of Nabuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Josephus) He flew the King then reigning, placed another in his Room, and carried Captives thence to Babylon, the Jews whom he found in that Country. Now concerning the time which Josephus gives unto this Business, and the Business it self, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the Prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Jerusalem, and carrying away thence unto Babel, who inhabited the miserable Ruines of that great City; which was in the same three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, is not improbably thought by good Authors to have been at the return from this Egyptian Expedition. But whereas Josephus tells us that there was another King put in the Room of Amasis by Nabuchadnezzar, we must understand, that he was only a Viceroy, and not (as some have mistaken it) that king that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his Reign in the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant unto the Prophecies before alledged, as to all Chronology and History. Some there are, which to help this inconvenience imagine that there were two successively bearing the Name of Amasis; others that there were two Amasis, the one slain by Nabuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a Name, it being once granted that the Person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of Life and Kingdom by the Affrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Amasis of whom the Greek Historians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nabuchadnezzar, seeing that he was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Neco, and made War (as they report) upon the Phoenicians, who were, before the Egyptians, become subject unto the Crown of Babylon. I might add perhaps, that he whom Nabuchadnezzar left as Governor of Egypt, was more likely to have had some Chaldean or Affrian than Egyptian Name; unless we should think that he had been a Traitor to his natural Prince, and for rewarded by the Conqueror with Lieutenantship of the Country: about which it were frivolous to dispute. Thus much in brief we ought to believe, that Nabuchadnezzar made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to give it away, any Man may guess; that he appointed one to Rule the Country, it is consequent unto the former, and hath Authority of Josephus; that this Governor (or some Successeur of, his) was afterward taken and slain by Amasis, I see probability enough to persuade my self; and yet can well be content, that others use their liberty, and believe what they list. As for the Army which this Egyptian King Amasis is supposed to have kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the Garrisons of mercenary Souldiers which were left by the Affrian for the Guard of his Viceroy, and custody of the new subdued Province: as likewise the Company returning from Cyrene and Barris, who together with the Friends of such as were slain in that Expedition, remembered before out of the Greek Historians, deposed and slew Amasis, I take them to have been the Egyptian Fugitives which then recovered their own Country. Sure it is that this Prophecy of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the People where they were scattered, and I will bring again the Captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return into the Land of Pharaoh into the Land of their Habitation, and they shall be there a small Kingdom. If the Egyptian Priests alledged hereunto in the Tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdom, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they devised Matter that had no shadow of Truth, only to keep the Greeks from knowledge of their Countries disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, since we know the Truth with them.

Of the sundry Accounts drawn from sundry Acts of Nebuchadnezzar's and of the destruction of Ninive, by him; the time of which Action is uncertain.

THEse Victories brought the Greatness of the Assyrian Empire to the fall, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzar's Reign in sundry places of Scripture. To speak any more of the Questions arising about the supposition of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might seem to be the over-handing of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captive in the third year of Jehoiakim's Reign (which ran along with some part of Nebuchadnezzar's first year) and was kept in Diet three years more, before he was brought into the King's presence; it could not be the second of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, wherein he interpreted the forgotten Dream of the great Image, foretelling the Succession of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The fame or the like may be said of divers places which refer sundry Matters unto their set years; as that of Ezekiel before-cited, where he fore-tells that Egypt should be given in Reward for the Service done before Tyru, dating his Prophecy in the seven and twentieth year; and that of Daniel, placing the Erection of the Golden Image in the eighteenth year: for these years held no dependence upon either the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, or of his Empire, nor yet upon any of the Captivities, but had reference to some memorable Action, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not ealie to be found, nor worth the labour of uncertain search.

Of any War made by Nebuchadnezzar after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt I do not read: excepting that against Ninive, the destruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Nabum. Ninive had long before been taken by Merodach (as in due place hath been shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldean, as Jehoiakim and Zedekiah tributary Kings of Juda had done, tasted likewise of the same Fortune. That the destruction of Ninive followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the Comparison which Nabum the Prophet made between this City that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt that was fallen already. But how long after this came to pass, it is (me-thinks) unpollible to find out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzar's Reign; the place of Nabum last cited is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some unto the first of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian Wars; the whole Prophecy of Nabum which went between the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very year of this destruction, or other Circumstances of the War, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in Person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like unto the vain Curiosity of Tiberius Cesar, enquiring who was the Mother of Heceba, or to the like idle pains which he should take; who would seek to learn what Woman that Huzzab Queen of Ninive was, whose woful Captivity the same Prophet Nabum likewise did fore-tell.

§. XI.

Of the latter time of Nebuchadnezzar; his Building, Madnes, and Death.

OF the Time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I think there are no Monuments extant; save those which we find among the Prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great Works at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himself so well that he brake out into these glorious words. Is not this great Babel that I have built for the House of the Kingdom, by the might of my Power, and for the honour of my Majesty? Surely if those things be true that are by Josephus rehearsed of him out of Berofus and Megasthenes, he might well delight himself with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent Buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple Wall; that besides other stately Works, he raised those huge Arches wherewith were born up the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the Air, and equalling the tops of Mountains, which most sumptuous Frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to have been reared, and finished in fifteen days.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we find little else recorded, than that (which indeed is most profitable for us to consider) his over-valuing of his own Greatness abased him unto a Condition, inferior to the poorest of Men. And not undeservedly fell these Judgments of God upon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many Victories, and much happiness in his own Life, but with a discovery of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certainty of his Dream, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet; he nevertheless became so forgetful of God, whose wonderful Power he had seen and acknowledged, that he caused a golden Image to be set up and worshipped: ordaining a cruel Death as Reward unto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly Will and Pleasure, which was utterly repugnant to the Law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof S. Jerome hath well noted; Vexat oblitio veritatis, ut qui dudum servum Dei quasi Deum adoraverat, nunc statuas suis fieri jubet, ut ipse quasi Deus in statua adoraretur: A happy forgetfulness of the Truth, that he who is lately had worshipped (Daniel) the servant of God, as if he had been God himself, should now command a Statue to be erected unto himself, wherein himself might be worshipped as God. From this impiety it pleased God to reclaim him, by the strange and wonderful delivery of those blessed Saints out of the fiery Furnace; who being thrown into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatry, were assisted by an Angel; preserved from all harm of the Fire; loosened from their Bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former Honour, by the King: who amazed at the Miracle, made a decree tending to the Honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this devotion of Nebuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his hasty zeal. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a Dream of the terrible Judgment hanging over his Head, which Daniel expounding, advised him to break off his sin by righteousness, and his iniquity by mercy towards towards the poor, that there might be an healing of his Error. Hereby it seems that Injustice and Cruely were the Faults, for which he was threatened, but this threatening sufficed not unto his reformation. For that so great a Monarch should be driven from among Men (according to the tenor of the Dream and interpretation) yea compelled to dwell with the Beasts of the field, and made to eat Grafs as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in Man's Judgment, that easily it might be thought an idle Dream, and much more easily be forgotten at the years end. One whole years leisure to repent was given to this haughty Prince: which repit of the execution may seem to have bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods Sentence. For at the end of twelve Months; walking in the Royal Palace of Babel, he was so overjoyed and transported with a vain Contemplation of his own seeming Happiness, that without all fear of Gods heavy Judgment pronounced against him, he uttered these lofty words before rehearsed, in vaunting of his Majestical Works which he had reared, as well beeming his Majestical Person. But his high Speeches were not fully ended, when a Voice from Heaven, telling him that his Kingdom was departed from him, rehearsed over unto him the Sentence again, which was fulfilled upon him the very same hour.

That Solomon and many other Princes and great ones, have taken delight in their own Buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I do not remember that ever I have read of any, that were punished for rejoicing in Works of this kind (though it is hard in Joy, or any passion of the Mind to keep a just measure) excepting only this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of David: for other (and some very goodly) Kings have mulctured all their Forces to the very last Man; but few or none have been known to have been punished as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawful to rejoice in those good things, wherewith God hath blessed us; but a note of much unthankfulness to entertain them with a full and unfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane Affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure Clouds, hindring the influence of that blessed Light, which clarifies the Soul of Man, and predisposeth it unto the brightness of eternal Felicity; so that insolent joy, which Man in the pride of his vain imagination conceiveth of his own Worth, doth above all other Passions blast our Minds, as it were with Lightning, and make us to reflect our thoughts upon our seeming inherent greatness, forgetting the whilst him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these male mentis gaudia; The evil joys of the Mind, were not unaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than sorrows, Cares, and Fears; not far from the Iron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is so unlikely Token of Vengeance near at hand, when these unreasonable fumes of proud and vain Joy, do rage in a Mind, that should have been humbled with a just Repentance and acknowledgment of ill deserving.

This was verified upon Nebuchadnezzar, whose Punishment was singular and unexampled. For he ran among Beasts in the Fields and Woods, where for seven years he lived, not only as a salvage Man, but as a salvage Beast, for a Beast he thought himself secundum suam imaginacionem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himself in the same manner, and with the same Food that Beasts do; Not that he was changed in Figure external according to Mediana, in so much as he appeared a Beast to other Mens Eyes, as S. Jerome in the Life of Hilarius (how true God knows) speaks of a Woman that appeared to all other Mens light a Cow, but to Hilarius only a Woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was laid to be into a Hind, nor made a Monster as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Jerom's Exposition of these words. At the same time was my Understanding refused unto me, etc. Quando dicit (saith S. Jerome.) sensum sibi reddidit, offendit non formam sed mentem; sed mentem; When he saith that his Sense was refused unto him, he sheweth that he had not lost his humane Shape, but his Understanding. Seven years expired, it pleased God to restore Nebuchadnezzar, both to his Understanding, and his Estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his Life, confessing his Power and everlasting Being; that he was the Lord of Heaven and Earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his Works were all Truth, and his Ways righteous. Which gave Argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his salvation; namely S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyrus, Carisostemus, and others. And for that place of Esay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforementioned Authors apply the same to Balshazar, because I say both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapter speakech of the King, and the destruction of Babylon jointly.

OF EVILMERODACH.

HAVING already spoken what I could of the Succession and Years of Nebuchadnezzar's Posterity; the most that may be said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here again rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdom burning in a War that consumed it to Ashes. He lost Egypt by rebellion of the People, in the nineteenth year of his Reign, which was forty years after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the Account of Herodotus, who allows to Amasis four and forty years of Reign; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fifty, saying that he died in the third year of the threecore and third Olympiad, when Cambyfes did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seven and thirty years, which passed between the second year of the four and fiftieth Olympiad (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fifth of Cambyfes his Reign; wherein he was in Egypt; of which seven and thirty years it is credibly held, that Plamenius, the Son of Amasis, reigned three; so that Amasis could be no longer King than four and thirty years. But seeing that these two Greek Historians have been abused by Egyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marvel though they were also deceived in the length of his Reign. This is the plain Answer to this Objection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and four and forty set down in stead of four and thirty, or that Amasis did temporize a while with the Assyrians, and not bear himself as absolute King of Egypt, until the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proved out of Ezekiel, that Egypt became again a Kingdom) I hold it a superfluous excise.

Whether these Egyptian Troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deal with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in Fame and Reputation, gotten by the decayed Valour of his People, than in present Forces; or whether (as I rather think) some foul received by the Assyrian invading Media, emboldened the Egyptians to rebel against him: I will neither undertake, nor seek to define.

Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 1. Xenophon tells that the first Service of young Cyrus in War was under Ahyages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous Fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set upon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen years old. If therefore Cyrus lived three or four years more (as he is said to have died well stricken in years) which is held to be the ordinary term of no short Life, then was this Encounter in the third year of Evilmerodach his Reign. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the War began more early between these Nations, for as much as the manner of their Fight in former times, with other Circumstances intimating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gave courage unto those that had felt him a troublesome Neighbour, to stand upon prouder Terms with the Assyrians, than in his flourishing Estate they durst have used. Howsoever the Quarrel began, we find that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchy. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which he received by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew unto his Party the Lydians, and all the People of the lesser Asia, with Gifts and strong Persuasions, hoping so to overwhelm his Enemies with a strong Invasion, whom in vain he had sought to weary out with a lingering War.

This happened after the death of Ahyages, who left the World in the nineteenth year of Evilmerodach, at which time Amasis took possession of Egypt. So that the Assyrian having his hands already full of Business, which more earnestly did affect him, seems thereby to have given the better means unto the Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdom, which by long distance of place did sundry times find occasion to rebel in after-ages, and set up a King within it self, against the far more mighty Persians.

The issue of these great Preparations made by Evilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way unto the fulfilling of those Prophecies, which were many years before uttered against Babel by Elsay and Terny.

For the Assyrians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their Numbers, thought to have buried the Medes, and Persians, under their thick showers of Arrows and Darts, were encountered with an Army of stout and well-trained Men, weightily armed for close Fight, by whom they were beaten in open Battel, wherein Evilmerodach was slain. So that great Frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and upheld, being shaken and grievously cracked under his unfortunate Son, was left to be sustained by his unworthy Nephew: a Man more likely to have overthrown it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repair it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

A private Conjecture of the Author, serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berofus, concerning the Successors of Evilmerodach, without wrong to the Truth, the Quality, and Death of Balthazar.

Though I have already (as it seems to me) sufficiently proved that Balthazar was the Son, and immediate Successor to Evilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the Conjectures of those Writers, which following Berofus, insert Niglisar or Niriglisar, and his Son Lubassardach between them: as also that which I find in Herodotus of Nitocris a famous Queen of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City; I have thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what means it was possible that some Errour might have crept into the History of those times, and thereby have brought to us a needless trouble of searching out the Truth, as it were by Candle-light, in the uncertain fragments of lost Authors, which we might have found by Day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First, therefore I observe, that the time which Berofus divides between Evilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the years in which Nabuchodonosor lived wild among brute Beasts in the open Field: Secondly, that the suddenness of this Accident, which came in one hour, could not but work much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtless the Honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his Calamity pitied, and his Restoration hoped; the Prediction of Daniel finding Reputation in that Clause which promised his Recovery, as being verified in that which had been more incredible. Now if we do in common Reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdom, for settling the Government, whilst the King was thus distracted, we shall find it most likely, that his Son and Heir did occupy the Royal Throne, with Condition to restore it unto his Father, when God should enable him to repossess it. In this his Rule Evilmerodach being to supply the utter want of Understanding in his Father, as Proteus do the unripeness of it in young, but Herodotus reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the Insolencies, or fall into the Troubles, incident to such an Office. That he had in him very small Ability of Government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when he held it in his own Right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his Sister) was a Woman of an high Spirit, it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that she was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and useful Works about the River of Euphrates, and her Fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Towns from the Assyrians, and amongst them Ninive. Wherefore it were not unreasonable to think, that such a Woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her Brothers misgovernment, used Practices to get the Rule into her own hands, and afterwards, as a Mother, to leave it unto her ungracious Son. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have reigned, we do not find; but we find in Berofus (as Josephus hath cited him) that Niglisar, who got the Kingdom from Evilmerodach, was his Sisters Husband; which argues this to have been the same Woman. As for Lubassardach the Son of Niglisar, if at the end of nine Months Reign he were for his lewd Conditions slain by the Nobility, as the same Berofus reporteth, it seems that God prepared here by the way for Nabuchodonosor's restitution (whose term of punishment was then expired) by railing such troubles as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the People. I will not here use many words to comfort that which Berofus hath further set down of Evilmerodach, telling us that he was slain by his Sisters Husband: for the plain words of Scripture naming the year wherein he gave liberty to Telmouch, do plainly testify that he out-lived the three or four and fortieth year of his Fathers Reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to have succeeded Evilmerodach in the Kingdom, might indeed have so done, though not when he held it in his own right. Of Balthazar who was his Son and Heir, we find, that he had such conditions, as God permitteth to be a King for the ruine of the People. He was from his young years of a mischievous nature; having in his Fathers time slain a Noble young Man that should have married his Sister, only for spite and envy to see him kill two wild Beasts in hunting, at which himself having thrown his Javeline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his Beauty, said it were a happy Woman that should be his Wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though unfortunate Prince) to revolt from him unto the Ene, my as soon as he was King. Neither do I find that he performed any thing worthy of Record, but as a Coward and a Fool he lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to give Battel to them that daily took somewhat from him; yet carefully seeking when danger had hemmed him in on every side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was bale and miserable, for he died as a Fool taken in unexcusable security, yet had not that happiness (such as it is) of a death free from apprehension of fear, but was terrified with a dreadful Vision, which had shewed his ruin not many hours before even whilst he was drinking in that Wine, which the Swords of his insulging Enemies drew out of him, together with his last Blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable Reign of seventeen years he perished like a Beast, and was slain as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath been spoken heretofore; in matter of his affairs, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose Story that of Balthazar is but an Appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the Original and first Greatness of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were chief Actors in the Subversion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthazar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was joyued first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it self.

Of the Race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himself, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Provincial Governors having cut down the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, divided between them the Eastern Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the Race of Arbaces dying about two years after that the Line of Belochus was ended in Balthazar; the Dominions as well of the Conqueror, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely, to Cyrus of the House of Achæmenes, the Princes of which Blood reigning in Persia, had formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Family of Achæmenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third Son of Japhet; that they had Kings soon after the Flood, Lactantius and Dionysius have found Record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydapes, and Dionysius speaketh of Pharnus with his seven Sons, slain by the Assyrian in the beginning of their Empire. But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians; I take the List and Number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these:

Arbaces	Who reigned	23 years.
Sofarmus		30 years.
Medius		40 years.
Cardace		13 years.
Diocles		53 years.
Pharaces		24 years.
Cyaxares		32 years.
Ahyages		38 years.
Darius Medus

And though the Greeks ascribe the Conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach us that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Army victorious over Balthazar was his; as the Assyrian and and Babylonian Empire also was during his own life. For we find in Daniel that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdom being threecore and two yeares old. And further what Officers it pleased him to set over the Kingdom. And so was it precephed by Isaiah long before: Behold I will lift up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremy, The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes, for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Julius Africanus doth well open, who taking Authority from Liodor, Cassor, Thallus, and others, delivereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to Reign, which also agreeth with Serabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Affyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Justin, and Herodotus, are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Perians.

HOW the Kingdom of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians; but rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the Conquest of Babel to the Perian only. For some there are who deny that Affyages had any other Successor than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth that Cyrus was no way descended from Affyages (whom he calleth Affyages or Apama) but only that having vanquished him in Battle, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amysis. But I find the relations of Ctesias often cited and seldom followed, and himself sometimes very justly reprov'd of wilful untruth.

Viginius a diligent and learned Historian of this Age, produceth many probable reasons that Affyages had no such Son as Cyaxares, or Darius Mandane; and to confirm his opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Justin, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Ispocrate, and before them Cassor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who do not find any such Successor. Neither do Tatianus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Julius Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Justin Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Jerome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithful Author by them read, that hath given other Son or Successor to Affyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of Argument, ab authoritate negat, doth never enforce consent; we may be the bolder (all this great Lift of Noble Writers by him alleged notwithstanding) to affirm that either Affyages himself must have been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; or else to give him some other Successor, according to Josephus, and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chief, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life being no other than the Lieutenant of his Army, and subject to his Authority; the strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Perians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being joyned together to compound it.

But it is very certain that the honour of that great Victory over Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himself, not only for this action, but for the delivery of his Church; a greater work in the Eyes of God, than the subversion of any State or Monarchy, how powerful soever.

And it may well be thought, that the Soldiers employed in that service did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best Man of War, than to the Median, who was greatest in Riches and Power. All which also falling upon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his Posterity, did much augment the fame of his virtue, which among Prophane Historians over-grew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, and did nothing in Person; as also because he soon after quitted the World, and left all to Cyrus, who was possessor of whatsoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried far off.

And for the Greek Historians, they took all things from the relations of the Perians, who gave to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the first, fifth, and sixth Chapters of his Prophecies, makes it plain that himself not only lived a great Officer under King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus, which being the year of Darius's death, could not have been distinguished from the Reign of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned jointly; neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdom by Cyrus's permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

§. III.

Xenophon's relation of the War which the Medes and Perians made with joyn't Forces upon the Affyrians and others.

THESE Testimonies of the Scriptures, which need no other confirmation, are yet made more open to our understanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these Wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Affyrian had enlarged his Empire with Victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought under his subjection, there should not then be left any Nation adjoining able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threecore thousand Foot, and above ten thousand Horse, to which the Forces of Peria being joyned made an exceeding strong Army.

The Affyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, invited Cresus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in Men and Treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the less to his assistance, alleging that those Eastern Nations were very powerful, and so firmly conjoyned by League and many many Alliances, that it would not be easie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements strengthened with great presents, he drew to himself so many adherents as he compounded an Army of two hundred thousand Foot, and threecore thousand Horse, of which, ten thousand Horse, and forty thousand Foot were led by Cresus, who had great cause of enmity with the Medes, in regard of the War made by them against his Father Alyattes; but this great Army was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus General of the Perian Forces, utterly broken; upon which Defeat the Affyrian King being also slain, so many of the Affyrians revolted, as Babylon it self could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summs of Money out of Asia the less, Aegypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered Forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, posselt himself of a great part of the lesser Asia, at which time it was, as I take it, that Cresus himself was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soon after, the Army lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his Sifters Son, prevailed against Babylonia, as in due time shall be set down.

Those Perians which followed Cyrus, and by him led, are numbered thirty thousand Foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common sort were Archers, or such as used the Dart and the Sling. So far Xenophon. Of whom in this Argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the pattern of a most Heroical Prince, with much Poetical addition; so it cannot be denied, but that the bulk and grofs of his Narration was founded upon meer Historical truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like Writer, that in every speech and circumstance he hath precisely tied himself to the Phrase of the Speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his own invention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Moral and Politick discourse, and examining but the History of things done, it will easily appear that Xenophon hath handled his undertaken subject in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the body.

§. IV.

The estate of the Medes and Perians in times foregoing this great War.

FOR it is commonly agreed upon, that Achamenes, the Son of Peres being Governor of Peria, did allocate himself with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that Rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the Victory obtained, held for himself the Dominion of those Countries which he had formerly ruled for the Affyrians; as also that they conveyed over the same honour and power to their Posterity; which in Media was not absolutely Regal, but with some restraint limited, until such time as Dejoces took upon him the full Authority and Majesty of a King.

From the death of Sardanapalus to the Reign of Dejoces, are usually accounted about an hundred and forty years, in the last sixty whereof there reigned in Affyria mighty Princes, namely Salmassar and his Successors, whose great achievements in Syria and elsewhere witness, that the Medes and Perians found it not for their advantage to undertake any offensive War against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the League continued as yet between these the Successors of Belshazzar, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Dejoces to the first of Affyages, there past about ninety years, in which if Herodotus have written truly, that Phraortes conquered Peria, and how he and other the Kings of Media by many Victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had been but an unadvised enterprise of the Affyrians and Babylonians, to have wasted themselves against the Syrian and Aegyptian, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing upon the South parts of Peria, and that the Perians themselves were not Masters of Susana in Nabuchodonosor's time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governor for the Babylonians in Susa or Susan, the chief City thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either under Cyaxares or Affyages, or both, had quarrel with Halyattes the Father of Cresus, which after some six yeares dispute was compounded.

How the affairs of Peria stood in so many ages, I do not find any memory. It seemeth that the roughness of the mountainous Country which they then posselt, with the confederacy which they continued with the Medes, gave them more security than fame: For if these Kings, being the Posterity of Achamenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatness which they afterward obtained would not have suffered any forgetfulness thereof. But as we find all Xenophon's reports, both of these Wars and the state of those Countries to be very consonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appears, that the Race of Achamenes held the Principality of Peria from Father to Son for many descents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyses the Father of Cyrus was King of Peria: than to those that make him a mean Man, and say, that Affyages gave him his Daughter Mandane in Marriage, to the end that her Son (whose Nativity he feared) might be disabled from any great undertaking by his Fathers inability.

For what cause of grief could it be to Affyages, that the Son of his Daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No; it was more likely, that upon such a Prophecy his love to his Grand-child should have increased, and his care been the greater to have married him to some Prince of strength and eminent virtue.

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and as I think the deviser of the mischief intended against Cyrus by his Grand-father, doth confess, that the Line of the Achamenes was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in his height of his Prosperity did thence derive himself, and vaunt of it: which he would never have done, had they been ignoble, nor had they been the Vassals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this sort Xerxes in the seventh of Herodotus deriveth himself.

this terrible sentence, whereof the King and all his wife men were utterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting God's goodness to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprived him of his estate and understanding, so upon the acknowledgement of God's infinite Power he restored him to both. This King, notwithstanding, lifted himself up against the same God; and presuming both to abuse those Vessels dedicated to holy uses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praised and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Brass, Iron, Stone and Wood: and therefore those words, from the Oracle of a true God delivered, (to wit) Mene Tekel Upharais, gave the King knowledge, that God hath numbered the time of his Kingdom, and finished it; That he was weighed in the balance of God's Justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians.

The very evening or night of this day, wherein Balthazar feasted and perished, Cyrus, either by his epycals, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himself, whose enigma he followed in this Warfound the time and opportunity to invite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobility were no less filled with the vapours of Wine, than their hearts with the fear of God's judgement, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut down with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Euphrates dry for the present, by whole channel running, his Army made their entrance, finding none to disturb them. All the Town lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleep and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, unless they saved themselves by flight, as some did, who ran away crying, and filling the streets with an uncertain tumult.

Such Affrican Lords as had revolted from Balthazar, and betaken themselves to the party of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected company to the King's Palace; which having easily forced, they rushed into the Chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, slew both him and them without any mercy, who struggled in vain to keep those lives which God had newly threatened to take away. And now was the Prophecy of Jeremy fulfilled, and that of Ezra two hundred years before this subversion; in his (seven and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction to feelingly and lively, as if he had been present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had seen the great and unfeared change and calamity of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrows and bewailings of every surviving soul thereunto subject. His Prophecy of this place he beginneth in these words; Come down, and sit in the dust, O Virgin Daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And again, Sit still, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans; for thou shalt no more be called the Lady of Kingdoms. For, though it cannot be doubted, that God used Nabuchodonosor, and the Chaldeans, to punish the Idolatry of the Judeans; yet Ezra teacheth us in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his judgements was mixt with a rigorous extremity. For (saith Ezra) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hand: thou didst show them no mercy, but thou didst lay thy very heavy yoke upon the ancient. I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the Name, and the Remnant, and the Son, and the Nephew. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found, shall be stricken down: whosoever joyeth himself, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces be- fore their eyes, their boues spoiled, and their Wives ravished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this Victory of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the fame to posterity after it happened, than Ezra hath done in many places of his Prophecies, which were written two hundred years before any thing attempted.

The greatness and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors let down, might seem altogether fabulous: for, besides the reports of Saint Hieron, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politicks, the second Chapter, received the report for true, That one part of the City knew not that the rest was taken three days after. Which is not impossible, if the testimony of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who finds the compass at three hundred and threescore Stadus or Furlongs, which makes five and forty Miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, that six Chariots might pass in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clinacrus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fifty Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Book of Geography, gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twenty Furlongs more to the former compass, reckoning the same at three hundred fourscore and five Furlongs, which make eight and forty Mile and one Furlong, but finds the Wall far under that which Diodore reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thickness but at two and thirty foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much; every cubit containing a foot and a half of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the City he gives the same with Siculus, and eight Furlongs more. Herodotus finds a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, four hundred and fourscore furlongs circles; the thickness of the wall he measures at fifty cubits, and the height at two hundred of the same regal cubit. He also, in entrance, it had an hundred Gates of Brass, with Posts and Hooks to hang them on of the same metal: and therefore did the Prophet Ezra rightly inscribe Babylon, The Princess and Glory of Kingdoms.

But when Cyrus had won her, he stripped her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a slave; dividing not only all her goodly houses, and her whole Territory, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers; but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bond-slaves upon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the reign of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologists to have lasted only seven years: in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all Wise Kings that are desirous to establish a royal Power to themselves and their posterity.

§ VI.

The end of Cyrus.

THE last War, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Justin deliver, That after the Conquest of Asia the less, Cyrus invaded the Massagetae, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queen: and that in an encounter between the Persians and these Northern Nomades, Tomyris lost her Army, and her Son Spargapises that commanded it: In revenge whereof, this Queen making new levies of men of War, and following the War against Cyrus, in a second battle, beat the Persian Army, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a bowl of blood, using these words, words; Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for blood, now drink thy fill and satiate thyself.

It should here seem, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was persuaded to abate their fury by some forcible invasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares, Father to Alyattes, those Scythians invaded Media and Asia the less, and held the same in a servile subjection eight and twenty years.

This War, which Metasthenes calleth Tomyriake, lasted (saith he) six years, and took end at the end of Cyrus.

But in this particular I believe with Viginier, that this Scythian War was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Spartetha, though he deliver the success of that War otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (saith Viginier) because Strabo in his eleventh Book rectifyeth, that Cyrus surprised the Sacians by the same stratagem by which Justin saith, he defeated the son of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last War which Cyrus made, was against Amorheus King of the Derbicani, a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three days after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his own City of Pasargadae, which himself had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is said to have been this: O vir, quicunque es, & undeunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoravi: Ego Jam Cyrus qui Persi imperium constitui, pulchrum hoc terra quo meum regitur corpus mihi ne incidatis. Obitu Man, quodviser thou art, or whencesoever thou comest, for I was not ignorant that thou shouldst come: I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire, do not envy unto me this little earth, with which my body is covered.

This Tomb was opened by Alexander, as Quintus Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of treasure, supposed to have been buried with him (or upon desire to honour his dead body with certain ceremonies) in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bows, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his body lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his own garment, and a Crown of Gold to be set upon it. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his body in the hands of Tomyris.

And surely had Cyrus lost the Army of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his Son would so soon have transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so far off from that quarter; the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media: neither had Cambyses been able in such haste to have undertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather believe Xenophon, saying, that Cyrus died aged, and in peace: and that finding in himself, that he could not long enjoy the world, he called unto him his Nobility, with his two Sons Cambyses and Smerdis, or, after Xenophon, Tanoxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himself, and taught others, of the immortality of the Soul, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserving of every man in this life; he exhorted his Sons by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetual concord and agreement. Many other things he uttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he governed Susa in Persia, and that Cyrus himself had read the Prophecy of Ezra, wherein he was expressly named, and by God (for the delivery of his people) preordained. Which act of delivering the Jews from their Captivity, and of restoring the holy Temple and City of Jerusalem, was in true consideration the noblest work that ever Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of God's power, used for the chaffing of many Nations, and the establishing of a Government in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the Grace to be an instrument of God's goodness, and a willing advancer of his Kingdom upon Earth; which must last for ever, though Heaven and Earth shall perish.

§ VII.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Jerusalem.

HAVING therefore spoken of his great Victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his service done unto him that was Author of them and of all goodnefs: I hold it meet at length to speak of the Decree made in the first of his Reign, being perhaps the first that ever he made after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captive Jews should return again into their own Territory, and re-build the House of God in Jerusalem, having now ended and finished the threescore and ten years captivity, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, he gave order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessary and wanting. He also restored unto them five thousand four hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the Grandfather of Balthazar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jews which returned out of Chaldea under their Leader Zorobabel, the Son of Sadaiah, and Nephew to King Jecoonias, and Jesús or Josafas the Son of Josadak, were about fifty thousands; where, as soon as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their own Law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Jews begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans and other Idolatrous Nations adjoining, gave all the impediment they could. So did the Governors of those Provinces under Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort favoured the Jews, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not only those which were but Provincial Lieutenantes, and other officers of less place, but Cambyses himself, who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was busied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoever Cambyses did when himself had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: they may herein relieve themselves out of Esdas, That by the confederacies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus's life, &c. And therefore it is true, what the Jews themselves affirm, as it is written in the second of Jobn, That the Temple was 46 years in setting up, having received so many hindrances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if we seek the natural and politick causes which moved Cambyses to withstand his Father's Decree, as well while he Governed under him, as when himself became sole and Sovereign Monarch: we shall find them in that Envy remembered by Esdas, written by Belshazzar, Mithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Counsellours in Phoenicia, wherein they complain that the Jews were evermore rebellious and troublemakers of Kings; that their City being once built, they would then refuse to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment, was, that Cambyses having in his resolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jews were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence under Moses, when they conquered Judea; their City being once repaired and fortified, they might return to their old vomit, and give the same disturbance to Cambyses's Conquest, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For, as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be understood, as Codman and others have observed, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors and Governours of Phoenicia complained against the Jews, did not precede, but succeed Darius Hyaspes, as in the sixth and seventh Chapters of Esdra's it is made plain: and also that those Governours (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and enclosing of the City, as by the reasons given in the said Epistle, and by the King's Answer, it is evident.

Also in the sixth of Ezra, the fourteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they Governed, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finished it (to wit the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandment of Cyrus and Darius, and Artahastate Kings of Persia. Lastly, in the seventh of Ezra it is written: Now after these things, in the reign of Artahastate King of Persia: which was as much as to say, after the finishing of the Temple in Darius's time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Esdra's is there named by anticipation, not in his own time and place.

And thus much concerning the re-building of the City and Temple of Jerusalem. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other Ordinances of Cyrus, with his form and manner of Government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death, he bequeathed the Empire unto his eldest Son Cambyses, appointing Smerdis or Tanaxerxes his younger son to be Satrap, or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusia; and then died, after he had reigned (saith Herodotus) one and thirty years, or (according to Justin) but thirty.

CHAP. IV.

The Estate of things from the Death of Cyrus to the Reign of Darius.

§. I.

Of the Number and Names of the Persian Kings.

OF the Successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbered the Persian Kings, and their times as followeth.

Darius Medus , and Cyrus jointly.	27
Cyrus alone.	22
Prissus Artaxerxes .	20
Darius Longimanus .	37
Darius Nothus .	19
Artaxerxes Mnemon .	55 years.
Artaxerxes Ochus .	26
Artes , or Artanes .	4
Darius , the last, conquered by Alexander .	6

To which Philo agreeth; which number of years added, make in all an hundred ninety and one. But

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his Issue: and whether Atossa were his Daughter, or (as some think) were the same with Queen Heltir.

Cyrus had issue two sons, Cambyses and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Arystona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amytis. Atossa and Meroe their brother Cambyses married: Arystona, Darius Hyaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyses being dead: who (as some Writers have supposed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be avenged of the whole Nation for the cruel intent that Aman (whom the old Translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Jews, though the opinion of Josephus be more probable, who finds Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be understood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should have been Eisler, whose History seems rather to appertain to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the Son of Hyaspes or Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to have Greece brought under the yoke of Persia, was partly grounded upon the honour which thereby the thought her husband might obtain, partly upon a feminine humour of getting many brave Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot give assent to the opinion of Codman, who upon the near sound of the two names, Atossa and Hadassa, (by the latter of which Eisler was also called) makes them to have been one person. For though it be true that Eisler concerning her parentage, a while might be taken for a great Lady; yet Codman's inference is nothing probable, that the should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare unto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certain it is, that Eisler did at length discover her Kindred and Nation; whereby, if Histories could be kept free from this error, yet the People, and especially the Nobility, must needs have understood the truth: who nevertheless did so well know the parentage of Atossa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her son Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdom before his elder Brother, against whom also he could have pretended a very weak claim. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

This account (as I have said) the most Chronologers, and the best learned approve. These Persian Princes, being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Peucer in his historical Animadversions, hath gathered the places; finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, ch. 36. vers. 22, 23. Ezra, 1. ch. 1. vers. 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly, Cambyses in the eleventh of Daniel, who may indeed be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the Marginal Commentator upon the Geneva understands that place; but under correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hyaspes was an enemy to the people of God, and stood against them: his great favour and liberality to the Jews being elsewhere proved.

Thirdly, Is Darius Hyaspes found in Ezra the first, c. 4. v. 5. who in the sixth verse is also named Abasuerus.

Fourthly, In the eleventh of Daniel, verse the second, Xerxes is plainly foretold and described, and the great War which he should make against the Greeks by Daniel also remembered.

Fifthly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seven, who is also called Aribasathas, c. 4. l. 1. Ezra v. 7. and chap. 7. v. 7.

Sixthly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. v. 24. and cap. 5. v. 6. Nehem, cap. 12. v. 22.

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem, cap. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Artes; for Darius the last, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the son of Atossa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the issue male of Cyrus failing with his own Sons.

But to proceed, Eusebius, with the Latins following the Greeks, apply the beginnings and ends of every Persian King with their AOs, to some certain Olympiad: As the War of Altyages (Cyrus his maternal Grandfather) and Alyattes (Cresus his Father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad. The beginning of Cyrus's reign, to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The invasion of Egypt by Cambyses to the third year of threecore and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement between several forms of computation, add the more credit unto both.

Again, this historical demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomical computation of Ptolemy, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the four hundred and four and twentieth year after Nabonassar. And the Era of Nabonassar began on the six and twentieth of February: which, conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth month of the first year of the eighth Olympiad. So that whether we follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as do the Greek Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolemy, we shall find every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

For Ptolemy reckons the time answerable to two hundred and four and twenty Julian years, and an hundred and forty days from Nabonassar to the sixteenth of July, in the seventh year of Cambyses.

The Greeks, and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyses in the second or third year of the threecore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyses's seventh year, in the first of the threecore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the threecore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyses, is according to Ptolemy the two hundred and six and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassar's Era and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twenty years) agrees with the third of the threecore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greeks. In this Josephus agrees with the Greeks throughout, saving that he joyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus in the destruction of Babylon, which is true, and not contrary to the Greek computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, The disagreement and confused accounts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearsed, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greeks, which being constant in itself, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of Cambyses, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

VVE will therefore according to the truth give the Empire of Persia to Cambyses, the Son of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, having the desire to increase the greatness of his Empire: whereof he was possessor in his Father's time, while Cyrus made War in the North. Ctesias with others give him a longer Reign than agreeth with the Grecian account before received.

In the fifth year of his sole reign, and in the third year of the threecore and third Olympiad, according to Didore and Eusebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrow the King thereof, Psammetichus, he not only caused him to be slain, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependents, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctesias give for cause of this War (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyses) that when he sent to Amasis King of Egypt, to have his Daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nixetes the Daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyses disdained.

Howsoever it were; true it is, that Cambyses gathered an Army fit for such an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entered Egypt, Amasis died, and left Psammetichus, whom Ctesias called Amyrtus, his successor; who enjoyed Egypt after his Father (according to the best Copies of Herodotus) but six months, though other Chronologers give him six years.

But how long soever he held the Crown, in one battle he lost it, and was himself taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyses, following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that he also trusted him with the Government of Egypt, and that upon some revolt, or suspicion thereof, he caused him to be slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if we may believe Herodotus and Thucydides; but that he left a Son called Inarus, who caused the Egyptians to revolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Plaminius, was at the first entreated gently by Cambyfes, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he found him Amasis the King of Egypt, who died before his arrival, that he caused his body to be drawn out of the grave, and after divers indignities used, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custom both of the Egyptians and Perfians. For the Egyptians used to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the Worms might not devour them. The Perfians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feed it with Carrion.

* Neither did the Perfians ever consume their dead to ashes, till the time of Syle Dictator, who caused his own to be devoured by that Element, fearing the Law called Taliois, or like for like, because himself had uncombed the carcass of Cajus Marius after his death. Her. l. 7. Plin. l. 6. c. 24. Strabo & Juft. l. 1. pag. 87, 88. Her. l. 3. Sect. 1. 7.

§. III.

The rest of Cambyfes his AGIs.

AFTER this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyfes sent an Army into Cyprus, and constrained Ezelbas King thereof to acknowledge him who before held that Island of the Egyptians.

While Cambyfes yet busied himself in Egypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as he caused the Images themselves, with the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to be torn down and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Army into Lybia to overturn the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; but the Devil, in defence of his Oratory, raised such a Tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of the Country is covered, as the Perfians were therewith choked and overwhelmed.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdaining to be reliev'd, he prepared the rest of his Army, which himself meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those inconveniences, which his first-levied troops had tried, he changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings have power over-men, yet the Elements do not obey them; according to that old English Proverb, Go, faith the King, Stay, faith the Tide.

After his return from the attempt of Æthiopia, he caused Apis the Egyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be slain: a deed very commendable had it proceeded from true zeal, and been executed as in service of him that only is, and liveth. But soon afterwards, when in a dream it seemed unto him that Smerdis did sit in the Royal Throne of Perfia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus he gave in charge to his favourite Smerdis, to murder Smerdis his Brother. And having married his own Sisters, contrary to the Perfian Laws, he committed a most cauleless and most detestable murder upon the one of them called Meroe, then by himself with child, because he bewailed the death of her Brother Smerdis.

Her. p. 89. dis. 5. I find it written of this Cambyfes, That because his Predecessors observed religiously the Ordinances of the Empire, he assembled his Judges and enquired of them, whether there were any Law among the Perfians that did permit the Brother to marry his own Sister; it being his own intent to do: the Judges (who had always either Laws or distinctions in store to satisfy Kings and times) made answer That there was not any thing written allowing any such conjunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their customs, that it was always left to the will of the Perfian Kings, to do what itself pleased themselves; and so as Naxelorus terms it, inveniens occasionem: that is as much as to say, The Judges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it concerned not the King's private satisfaction, he caused Sifannus, one of his Judges, and perchance one of those which favoured his inconsiderate march, to be flayed alive, for an unjust judgement given, and the same his hide to be hung up over the judgement-seat. After which, bestowing the Father's Office on his Son, he willed him to remember that the same partially deferved the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the Son of his beloved Praxaspes, was very strange and ungrateful. For when he desired to be truly informed by him what the Perfians thought of his condition, Praxaspes answered, That his virtues were followed with abundant praise from all men, only it was by many observed, that he took more than usual delight in the taste of Wine: with which taxation inflamed, he used this replication: And, Are the Perfians double-tongued, who also tell me, that I have in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? Thou Praxaspes shalt then witness, whether in this report they have done me right: for if at the first thou pierce thy Sons heart with an Arrow, then is it false that hath been spoken; but if I miss the mark, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true, and my Subjects believed. This being spoken, he immediately directed an Arrow towards the innocent child, who falling down dead with the stroke, Cambyfes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broached on the Arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly rejoicing, shewed it to the Father, with this saying instead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaspes thou mayst rejoice thy self, that I have not let my wits with Wine, but the Perfians theirs, who make such Report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exercised, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felonde foy. For when he was informed, that Patzizites and Smerdis the Magi (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanis and Cimerdus) Ministers of his domestic affairs, taking advantage of the great resemblance between Smerdis the King's Brother, and Smerdis the Magus, posselt themselves of the Empire, he made all haste towards Perfia; and in mounting hastily on horse-back, his sword disheathing, pierced his own Thigh, wherewith deadly wounded, falling into an over-late and remediless repentance of the slaughter which he had executed upon his own Brother, he soon after gave up his wicked ghost, when he had reigned eight years, accounting therein those seven months in which the Magi governed, while he was absent.

In Cambyfes the Male-Line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierom gives him a Daughter called Pantaspes, and a Son called Orontes: who being drowned in the River Opbitis; by Antioch, the same was afterward, in memory of the Princes death, called Orontes.

He built the City of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Lutopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Island of Nilus, calling it by the name of his Sister Meroe.

§. IV.

Of the Inter-regnum between Cambyfes and Darius.

CYRUS and his two Sons being now dead, and the Kingdom in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfeits of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Provincial Governors of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyrus, Aspatis, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achemenes the first Perfian King) having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joynd their forces together ther surprized and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions and Assistants. In which action (saith Juflin) Intaphernes, and Aspatis were slain: but Herodotus otherwise, that they were only wounded; for he avoweth, that all the seven Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governor, these Princes grew into a consultation how the same might be ordered from thenceforth. Otanes (one of the seven) did not fancy any election of Kings, but that the Nobility and Cities should confederate, and by just Laws defend their Liberty in equality, giving divers reasons for his Opinion, being, as it seemed, greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyfes: As first, that it was not safe to give all power to any one, seeing greatness itself, even in good men, doth often infect the mind with many vices, and that liberty and freedom in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that Tyrants do commonly use the service of wicked men, and favour them too; they usurp upon the Laws of their Country; make other mens wives by force, and destroy whom they please without judgement.

Megabyrus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyranny of a multitude was thrice more intolerable than that of One. For the multitude do all things without judgement, run into business and affairs with precipitation, like raging and over-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most virtuous, because it is ever found, that excellent Counsels are ever had from excellent men.

CHAP. V.

Of Darius the Son of Hystaspes.

§ I.

Of Darius his Lineage,

DARIUS was descended of the Ancient Perfian Kings, to wit, of the Achemenides, of which Cyrus the Great was the lineal successor. For in this sort Herodotus delivers him as before;

Cyrus the first, who had

Trispitrus, who begat

Artaxerxes, who was Father of Aspatis, the Father of Hystaspes, the Father of Darius, Six-named Celrus, the Father of Xerxes.

Gen. 14.

Hystaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the wars against the Sophians: at which time Cyrus being made jealous of Darius by a dream of his own, caused him to be sent into Perfia; others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was delivered, and made Governor of the Perfian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyfes into Egypt; he then joynd with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neighing of his Horse, or, as others affirm, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he more assured to himself by taking two of Cyrus's Daughters, and as many of his Nieces for his Wives.

Darius gave the third Judgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because even among few duration of concord is seldom found, and in great Empires it doth ever happen, that the discord of many Rulers hath enforced the election of One Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, far safer to observe the Laws of our Country, by which Kingly Government hath been ordained.

The other four Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperial Government, by God established and made prosperous. And to avoid partially, it was accorded that the morning following, these seven Princes should mount on Horse-back and on him the Kingdom should be conferred, whose Horse, after the Sun-rising, should first neigh or bray. In the Evening, after this appointment was made, it is said, that Darius consulted with the Master of his Horse Oebarnus, who, in the Suburbs of the City, where the election was resolved of, caused the same Horse, whercon in the morning Darius was mounted, to cover a Mare, who, as soon as he came into the same place, was the first Horse that brayed. Whereupon the other six Princes descended from their Horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato, in the third of his Laws affirmeth, that in memory of the seven Princes, wherof Darius himself was one, that delivered the Empire from the usurpation of the Magi, he divided the whole into seven Governments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

§ II.

Of Darius his Government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

DARIUS devised equal Laws wherby his Subjects might be governed, the same being formerly promitted by Cyrus. He gave access to all his Subjects, and behaved himself mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Only he laid divers payments and taxes on the people which had not been accustomed in Cyrus's time, to the value of fourteen thousand five hundred and threecore talents, saith Herodotus.

The war which Cambyfes made afar off in Egypt, and the contention between the Magi and the Princes of Perfia for the Empire, gave heart to the Babylonians to recover their liberty, and to shake off the Perfian yoke; wherof Darius being advertised, he prepared an Army to recover that City and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult work, he used the service of Zopyrus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his own Ears and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to fly to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for having given him advice to give over the siege of their City, had in this fort dissembled and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gave gave him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandment of their greatest forces: which when Zopyrus had obtained, after some small colourable overthrows given to the Perfians upon fallies, he delivered the City into Darius his hands, who had by then been it twenty months.

§. III.

Of Darius his favour to the Jews in building the Temple.

Ezra. 6.

IN the second year of Darius, he gave order that the building of the Temple at Jerusalem should go on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his own charge, and out of the revenues of those Provinces which are situate between Euphrates and the Phanician, and midland Sea (whom Ezra calleth the Captains beyond the River) had hindered the Captains beyond his time, Darius gave commandment that they should not thenceforth come near unto Jerusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should withdraw themselves, and get them far off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latin it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; With-draw your selves far from them; In our English, Be ye far from thence, to wit, from the City, and Temple now in building.

Ezra. 6.

He also made a Decree which concerned his own Subjects, that whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting up of the Temple of God, that his house should be torn down, and the disburser hanged on the Gallows made maketh invocation to God; That hath caused his Name to dwell there (to) destroy all Kings and people that put their hands to after, and to destroy this house of God which is in Jerusalem, &c. In four years after which Decree (the Jews being really furnished with money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first return.

§. IV.

Of Darius his Scythian War.

Her. l. 4. 5.

AFTER the recovery of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whose King Justin calleth Laubimius, and faith, that Darius undertook this War against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to convey his Army into Scythia, he built a bridge of small Vessels over the River Ister or Danubius, and gave the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the less) to the Ionians and Æolians, among whom was Miltiades, who persuaded the Asian Grecians to break down the bridge, to the end Darius might not return thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficulty, but the same was resisted by Hystaspes Prince of Milet, a City of Ionis, which Nation, being a Colony of the Greeks, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Country, because they joynted themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaves, for as much as they would not run away from their Master, but were more mindful of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as fair an occasion of liberty as could have been desired. For the great Army of Darius entering the Desert Country called Essarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any succourance to relieve them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chirim Tartars, their posterity, at this day, all horse-men, using the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Graziers, driving their Herds from one place to another, as opportunity of Pasture led them. Standing Towns they had none, but used for Houses the Waggon wherein they carried their wives and children. These Waggon they placed at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Town, removable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himself, called now the great Chrim, any other City than such as Agora (as they name it) or Town of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himself, and wasted his provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither ways to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any thing at all, which either he himself might make use of, or by destroying it might grieve his enemies, he began to perceive his own folly, and the danger into which he had brought himself. Yet setting a good face upon a bad game, he sent brave messengers to the Scythians, bidding him his valour and fortune in plain battle; Or, if he acknowledged himself the weaker, then to yield by fair means, and become his Subject; giving him Earth and Water, which the Perfians used to demand, as a sign that all was yielded unto them. To this challenge the Scythians returned an Heroicall answer; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumb they drew interpreting by his own-will, thought that he did yield all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Cobryus, one of the seven Princes, who had slain the Magi, construed their meaning aright, which was thus; O ye Perfians, get ye wings like Birds, or dive under the water, or creep into holes in the Earth, for else ye shall not escape our Arrows. And this interpretation was soon verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Perfian Camp, drove the horse-men into the Trenches, and vexed the Army with continual Allarums day and night; were so fearless of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of courting a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldness of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were sick, and weak behind him, and with all speed marched away towards the River Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him; yet arriving at the Bridge before him, persuaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Perfian King should never more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly been proved true, had not Hystaspes the Milesian prevailed with his people, to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise fall to meet, when they returned from Ister to seek him out.

§. V.

Some actions of the Perfians in Europe, after the Scythian War.

Darius having thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the invasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which War he employed Megabates, who maltreated the Peonians, and transplanted them, and posselt Perimbis, Chalcidion, Byzantium, and other places, being also soon after subdued, and added to the Perfian Empire by Oannes, the Son of Symmetes, whom Cambyses had executed for false Judgement. So were the Cities of * Selybria, and a Cardia likewise taken in from the Perfian, who having now reduced of Thrace to the South of Constantinople: i. Cardia. a City upon the Coast of Thrace, at the foot of Lysimachia.

duced under his obedience, the best part of Thrace, did send his Ambassadors to Amintas King of Macedon adorning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Sovereignty over that Kingdom. Amintas doubting his own strength, entertained the Ambassadors with gentle words, and afterwards invited them to a solemn and magnificent feast; the Perfians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Ambassadors, who were well filled with wine, and presumed upon their greatness and many Victories, began to use such embracings, and other lascivious behaviour towards those noble Ladies, as Alexander the King's Son, great Grandfather to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Perfians barbarous presumption, besought his Father to withdraw himself from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Ambassadors, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while: promising their speedy return. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-favoured young men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to use the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the Feast, giving them in charge, That when the Perfians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpire them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soon after given by Darius for a severe revenge of this murder: But Alexander somewhat before the death of Amintas, gave his Sister Gygis in marriage to Eubazis, a principal Commander of Darius's forces on that side, who persuading her husband how helpful the Alliance of Macedon would prove for the invasion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that Tempest, which threatened to fall upon him very suddenly; the war of Asia the less, called Lucic, falling out at the same time.

§. IV.

The first occasion of the War which Darius made upon Greece, was a rehearsal of the Government in Athens, whence the quarrel grew.

NOW the better to understand the reason and motives of that great War, which followed soon after, between the Perfians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which City endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius's invasion on that side the Sea, with admirable success. Neither do I hold it any impertinency to be large in unfolding every circumstance of so great a business as gave rise to those wars, which never could be thoroughly quenched, until in the ruin of this great Perfian Monarchy, Persepolis the Capital City of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadful, as in the pride of their greatness, the Perfians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former books it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently Governed, the same being already set down, though scattering, and in several times among others the Contemporary occurrences of the Eastern Emperours, and the Kings of Judea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember again the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians, they maintained still their ancient polity under Kings, though they also after some fifteen descents were bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians, in the former books remembered, who willingly died for the safety of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as thinking none worthy to succeed him they changed their former Government from Monarchical to Princes for term of life, of which Medon the Son of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontide; and of these there were twelve Generations belides Medon, to wit,

Erixias was the last Archon of the decemviral Governors, which, from continuing threescore and ten years, was then changed into annual Magistrates, Mayors, and Burg-masters, of which Thetius was the first, according to Pausanias: others find Leocrates; and then

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdom, gave Laws to the Athenians, which were published, according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquinus Priscus, and were in after ages derived unto the Romans, and by the Decem-viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into Twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Roman Laws. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his own days violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed unto the practice and maintenance of a popular Government, the State of Athens was very soon changed into a Monarchy by Pisistratus the Son of Hippias: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus, two Citizens of Noble Families, were become the heads, took occasion by their contention and infidelity to raise a third faction more powerful than the other two, and more plausible for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in General. Having by this means obtained love and credit, he wounded himself, and feigned that by malice of his enemies he Hittæus had fought to put himself into Miletus; but the Citizens, doubting his conditions, chose rather to keep him out, and make shift for themselves, without his help. The strength of their City by Land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings and their good Fleet, which promised unto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to try theutemselv, when very few friends were left upon that Continent to take their part. But their Navy was broken as much by threatenings as by force: many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking them upon hope of pardons; and many being daunted with the causeless flight of those that should have assisted them. Neither was it long before the Town it self, being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slain, their wives and children made slaves, and their goods a booty to the Persians, whom for six years space they had put to so much trouble.

§ VIII.

The War which Darius made upon Greece with the battle of Marathon, and Darius his death.

This War with good success finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable success; Darius obstinate in the enterprise and Conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the War but against the Athenians and Eretrians, who jointly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Ambassadors, demand an acknowledgment from them all: among whom, some of them not so well resolved as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Ægians, and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians, after divers encounters forced them to give and) after divers encounters forced them to give pledges, and to relinquish the party of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this War, and caused his companion King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, far the more confident of victory, by reason of these discords, alienations and civil Wars among the Greeks. He therefore gave order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleet of Ships, fit to transport his Army over the Hellepont: in the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chief of his Army, he committed to Darius, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the Son of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athen twenty years before, and by Artabanes his Brother. Governor of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the less. These Commanders having their Companies brought down to the Sea-side, embarked themselves in six hundred Gallies and other Vessels; which lay in the mid-way between Asia the less, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Ægean Sea; but on the contrary they might always themselves relieve themselves in the passage, and shroud themselves from all sudden tempests and out-rage.

To this end, they first posited themselves of Samos; secondly, they attempted Naxos: which Island, the Inhabitants despairing of their own forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apoll was Native: which Island Darius did not only forbear to sack, but recalling the Inhabitants, he gave order to beautify the places and Altars of Sacrifice to Apoll erected. And having recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Euboea for that City (as already hath been shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians took ground, and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after six days assault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphrates and Philagius, they took it, sacked it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus far the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sails. From Euboea the Persians pass their Army into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athen, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athen.

The Athenians, finding the time arrived wherein they were to dispute with their own virtues against Fortune, and to cast lots for their liberty, for their wives, their children, and their lives, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and withall sent away with speed to the Negotiation one Phidippides; who passing through Athens, encountered in the way a familiar Devil, which he supposed to be Pan, who would him to assure the Athenians of victory, promising that some one of the gods should be present at the battle, to assist them, and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his return, feeling he could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly availing to bring news from Heaven, which he did not doubt (though the device was somewhat likely to be his own, yet) it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have been more stirred up with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries; than by any just cause or solid reason.

The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand only of the Platæans (who having been formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thébans, did in this extremity witness their thankfulness and grateful disposition) began to dispute. Whether it were most for their advantage to defend the walls of Athen, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of ten thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Platæans. In the end, and after great diversity of opinions, Miltiades, who perswaded the trial by battle, prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troops: two wings or horns, as they term them; and the body of a battle. The Persians when they perceived so small a troop advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather disposed of their understandings, than posited with the resolution whereof they made show. So invincible and refulgent, the Persians esteemed their own numbers to be, and that small troop of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be feared withal: But in conclusion, the victory being doubtfully balanced for a while, sometime the virtue of the Grecians, and sometimes the number of the Persians prevailed; the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were disordered and put to rout, the Athenians following their Victory even to the Sea-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saved themselves in their Ships.

The Persian Army consisted of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, of which there were slain in the place six thousand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred fourscore and twelve. For howsoever it came to pass, either by strange visions, which were afterward called Fœnic terrors, or by some other affright, it seemeth that the invading Army, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Hercules set down, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Julius's report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Army were slain, the same hath no appearance nor possibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the perfwader of the enterprise was slain, with Julius and Cicero; but Suidas tells us, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos.

The greatest honour of this Victory was cast upon Miltiades, who both perswaded the trial by battle, and behaved himself therein answerably to the counsel which he gave. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Grecians, of mark and commandment, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesileus. It is also said, That Cyrcus following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which also being deprived, he took hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first year of the threecore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the war made by Coriolanus against his fellow Romans: Alexander the Son of Amyntas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Governor of Athen, according to Plutarch, or Hyblides, after Halicarnassus.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned back into the lesser Asia, Miltiades fought and obtained an employment against the Islanders at Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing over his Companies in threecore and ten Gallies, after six and twenty days assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himself being made unable, and his Companies discouraged, he returned to Athen: where those ungrateful Citizens forgetting all his services past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battle of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xantippus, the father of Pericles, (who envied his fame) call him into prison, and set on him a fine of fifty Talents; where his weak and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his Estate to pay the other, he after a few days ended his life.

Which envy of the better sort to each other, with their private Factions, assisted by the unthankful and witless people, brought them, not many years after, from a Victorious and Famous Nation, to base subjection and slavery. Miltiades left behind him one son called Cymon begotten on Hegesippa, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his Father in valour, nor to Themistocles in understanding, but exceeded them both in Justice and good Government.

Now Darius taking great care how to recover his honour, than sorrow for his loss he received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike provisions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdom of great strength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the re-invasion of Greece. The diffention also among his Sons of whom the younger being born after he was King, and by so great a Mother as Atossa, disdaining to give place to his elder Brother, born before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, Death, who hath no respect of any man's affairs, gave end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joyined him to the earth of his Ancestors, about a year after the battle of Marathon, and after that he had reigned six and thirty years. He left behind him five sons, namely, Artabanes, born before he obtained the Kingdom, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achæmenes Governor of Egypt, Mages, and Anabiges.

CHAP. VI.

Of Xerxes.

§ I.

The preparations of Xerxes against Greece.

Xerxes received from his Father, as hereditary, a double War, one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Grecians, of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the success ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this War, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Perse were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hydarnes for his Grand-father, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artazotres, perswaded by many arguments the European War. But Artabanes, Brother to the late Darius, and Uncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsel, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous success of the two late Invasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsel: The one in person upon the Sythians, the other by his Lieutenants upon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his Enemies both his Army and his Honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well advised before he did too far imbarck himself in this business. For whatsoever undertaking hath deliberation and found counsel for conductor, though the success do not always answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variability of her own nature, which only the Divine Providence, and not any humane power can constrain.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanes, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the King's hatred, which he made known to all those that opposed his desire to this War (changing opinion and counsel) assisted the Grecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the War of Egypt was ended, four years were consumed in describing and gathering an Army for this Invasion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seven hundred thousand foot, and eight hundred thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts of carriage, if we may believe Hærodotus: for Herodotus of this multitude, Trogus finds the number less by seven hundred thousand foot-men.

The Commanders of the several Nations were the Princes of the blood of Perse, either by marriage in the King's house, or otherwise; for to this were all commandments of this nature given, none few people excepted, who had of their own Leaders.

The charge of the whole Army was bestowed on Mardonius, the Son of Gobrias, by a sister of Darius, to whom were joyed come others of Xerxes his nearest kindred, as Generals over all; saving that the charge of ten thousand fleet Perfians, called the Immortal Regiment (because if any one of the whole numbers died, or were slain, there was another prickly chosen in his stead) was given to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand Horsemen were led by the sons of Darius, who commanded the late Army of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200, and eight furnished by the Phenicians, who had Commanders of their own Nation, and by the Cyprins, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æolians, and Hellaspontines, who were trusted with the furnishing of their own Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Perfia, as by Artabagis, the Son of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certain Gallies furnished by Artemesia, the daughter of Lygdamer, Princess of Helicarnassus, and the Islands adjoining, which her self commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting of Zidon, in which Xerxes himself was embarked.

§ II.

XERXES'S Army entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Atlios from the Continent: his bridge of Boats over the Hellespont: and the discourse between him and Artabanus upon the view of the Army.

WHEN this World of an Army was thoroughly furnished, he caused all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendezvous, and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had assembled to the number of seventeen hundred thousand foot, as he entered the Border of Cætes, he was by one Pythius a Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Herds of Cattel gave food to Xerxes and his whole Army. The feast ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of Silver, and in Gold four Millions, wanting seven thousand of the Perfian Daries; which make so many of our Marks.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not only refuse his treasure offered, but commanded that seven thousand Daries should be given him to make up his four Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the Present. But soon after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his five sons from his attendance into Greece (because himself was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his own son) Xerxes most barbarously cauled the young man, for whom his Father sought exemption, to be sundred into two parts, commanding that the one half of his Carcase should be laid on the right, and the other half on the left hand of the common way by which the Army marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Atlios, making the same (with the halt Island or Head-land, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountain and the Chersonesus, or Neck of Land it self: a work of more operation, than of use, and yet an enterprise of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve furlongs, (which make about a mile and a half) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to pass in front. The Cities so severed from the main, were Dion, Olophyxus, Aerobon, Thysus and Gleone.

He also gave order, that a Bridge upon Boats should be made over the Hellespont between Abidus and Sestos, the Sea there having a mile of breadth, wanting an eighth part; which, after the finishing, was by a Tempest torn asunder and disfigured: where-with Xerxes being more enraged than disfigured, commanded those to be slain that were Masters of the work, and caused six hundred three score and four Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industry of the Phenicians; was so well anchored to resist both winds blowing into, and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boarded and railed, the whole Army of seventeen hundred thousand Foot, and four score thousand Horse, with all the Moyses and Carriages, pass over it into Europe in seven days and seven nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Cesar afterward use. And Caligula, that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridges, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Army brought near to the Sea-side, Xerxes took a view of all the Troops, assembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried up, and seated on a place over-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoining: and after he had gloried in his own happines, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerful an Army and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into tears, moved with this contemplation, That in one hundred years there should not any one survive of that marvellous multitude: The cause of which sudden change of passion when he uttered to Artabanus his Uncle, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troop within that number of years by the King remembered, is, That the life it self which we enjoy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few days given us in the world: there is no man among these, or elsewhere, that ever found himself to accompany with happiness, but that he oftentimes pleased himself better with the desire and hope of death, than of living; the incident calamities, diseases and sorrows whereof to mankind is subject, being so many and inevitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appear unto us over long: to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to over-cast those joys which they had now in pursuit with late remembrances. And holding still a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the Invasion of Greece, against which he had formerly given many strong reasons, desired him to deal freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous; or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good success? Artabanus, notwithstanding that he assured himself of the King's resolution to go on, and dared not by any new arguments to batter the great purpose it self, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellously affrighted him, and which the King should find, as he feared, to be most adverse; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the World any Port capable of so great a Fleet; inasmuch, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Havens thereof afford them any safety: and therefore when any such shelter shall be wanting unto them, he prayed him to understand, that in such a case of extremity, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the unsatiated desire of roan to obtain more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to give resistance, yet the want of means to feed such an Army, and the Famine which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered, diffable and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Xerxes, not daring perchance to utter what indeed he most feared, to wit, the overthrow of the Army it self both by Sea and Land, which soon after followed. These cautions were exceeding weighty, if Xerxes his obstinacy had not misperceived them. For to invade by Sea upon a perilous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, not succoured by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his Fortune, than enriched with understanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second upon England in the year 1588. who had belike never heard of this Counsel of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point: It is very likely that Xerxes his Army, which could not have in it less than two millions of Souls, besides his Beasts for Service and Carriage, should after a few days suffer famine, and using Machibael's words, Mourne sans cressies, die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait, and mountainous Country, to yield food (besides what served themselves) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they never meant to entertain, but with the sharpened points of their Weapons, destroying with all whatsoever they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may believe Herodotus, the Army of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopylae, consisted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twenty men, besides Landresses, Harlots and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that who-soever should enterprise any greater matter, if he gave the hearing to all that could be objected of accidental inconveniences, he should never pursue the same farther than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Perfian Kings had done, they had never grown to that greatness, or possessed so many Kingdoms and Nations, as they now did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were never undertaken without great peril. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had enforced him to that War. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerful prosperity of the Perfians endured, and that Greece were separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes his Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a dear experience) the fruit of this War was answerable to the plantation, and the success and end agreeable to the weak counsel whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his own judgement not sufficient, (for he gathered in, marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to fear the Greeks by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those uncountable multitudes: Non vires habent, sed pondus; & impedimenta potius sunt, quam auxilium: They are great in bulk, but weak in force, rather a luggage than aid.

Besides, as it was impossible to Marshal such a world of men in one Army, to the divers Nations, speaking divers languages, bred the same confusion among the Perfian Commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the Builders of Babel, when they came to work. Whereas if Xerxes had of five millions compounded ten Armies of fifty thousand chosen Souldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either prevailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their Territory, brought them into obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a Sea of men upon them, he was deceived both of his own hopes, and in their hearts whom he employed, and beaten by the Greeks, both by Land and Sea: yea, he himself, conducted by his fear, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Army was buried in Greece; the remainder whereof, which wintered in Thessaly, and led by Mardonius, who perused the enterprise, was in the summer following utterly defeated, and himself slain.

Of the fights at Thermopylae and Artemisium.

AFTER such time as Xerxes had transported the Army over the Hellespont, and landed in Greece (leaving the description of his passage along that Coast, and how the River of Liffus was drunk dry by his multitudes, and the Lake near Pissyrus by his Cattel, and about accidents in his Marches towards Greece) I will speak of the encounters he had, and the shameful and incredible overthrows which he received. As first at Thermopylae, a narrow passage of half an Acre of ground, lying between the Mountains, which did divide Thessaly from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with Gates which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedæmonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeates and Malintians, one thousand Arcadians, and other eloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, four hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole days together against that huge Army of the Perfians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first days fight, Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Army by one handful of thole men, whom not long before he had utterly despised: and when the second days attempt upon the Greeks had proved in vain, he was altogether ignorant how to proceed further; and so might have continued, had not a runnagate Grecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Army might ascend the ledge of Mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Perfian Army had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedæmonians, with his three hundred, and seven hundred Thespians, which were all that abode in him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not only resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Xerxes, having lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Souldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befall him by the virtue of such as had not been present at these battels, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deal. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great fear, whose manhood appeared singular in this trial, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the Field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian Arrows was so thick as would hide the Sun, he answered thus; It is very good news, for then shall we fight in the cool shade.

Such notable resolution having as freely been expressed in deeds, as was uttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the City of Sparta could arm well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedæmonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsel of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had always well advised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all Land-forces should assemble together to defend Ithaca, that freight neck of ground which joineth Peloponessus to the Continent. For which cause he advised, That three hundred Ships well manned, should be sent unto the Coasts of Laconia, to spoil the Country, and to hold the Lacedæmonians and their Neighbours busied at home, whilst Xerxes at his leisure having subdued the rest, might afterwards bring his whole power upon them, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further advised, That the said Fleet of three hundred Ships should seize upon the Island then called Cybera, now Cerigo, which lying near to the Coast of Laconia, might serve as a place of Rendezvous upon all occasions, either of their own defence, or endangering the enemy: whereby that ancient Speech of Chilon the Lacedæmonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrymen to have that Isle drowned in the Sea, than stand so inconveniently for them as it did. What effect this counsel might have taken, had it been followed, it is not easy to guess. But a contrary opinion of Achæmenes, Brother to King Xerxes, was preferred as the safer. For the Persian Fleet had been sorely vexed with a grievous tempest, which continued three whole days together, wherein were lost upon the Coast of Magestia, four hundred Ships of War, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseen, that if any such calamity should overtake them, there would not be found any Harbour wide enough to give them succour. Therefore Achæmenes persuaded his Brother not to disperse his Fleet; for if he did after the loss of four hundred Ships he shall send away other three hundred to seek all adventures then will the Greeks be strong enough by Sea to encounter the rest of the Navy, which holding all together, is invincible. To this counsel Xerxes yielded, hoping that his Land Army and Fleet, should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilst both held one course, and lay not far asunder. But herein he was far deceived; for about the same time that his Army had felt the valour of the Greeks by Land, his Navy likewise made a sorrowful proof of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecian Fleet lay at that time at Artemisium, in the straits of Eubæa, where the Persians thinking to encompass them, sent two hundred sail about the Island to fall upon them behind, using a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas, in a safe not unlike, but with far different success. For that narrow channel of the Sea, which divideth Eubæa from the Main, was in the same fort held by a Navy of two hundred three score and eleven sail against the huge Persian Armado, as the straits of Thermopylae had formerly been maintained by Leonidas, till he was circumvented, as this Navy might have been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred Ships that were sent about the Island, and the cause of their voyage, was two well known in the Persian Fleet, and soon enough disclosed to the Greeks, who setting sail by night, met them with a counter-fort, taking and sinking thirty Vessels, forcing the rest to take the Seawhere, being over-taken with foul weather, they were driven upon the Rocks, and call all away. Contrariwise, the Navy of the Greeks were increased by the arrival of fifty three Athensian Ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their party in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side, so the fear of Xerxes his displeasure stirred up the other to redeem their loss with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their unfortunate policy, they resolved in plain fight to repair their honour, and casting themselves into the form of a Cretcent, thought to to inclose the Greeks, who readily did prevent them betwixt Artemisium.

The fight endured from noon till night, and ended with equal loss to both parts. For, though more of the Persian Ships were sunk and taken, yet the lesser loss fell altogether as heavy upon the Greeks Fleet, which being small, could worse bear it. Herein only the Barbarians may seem to have had the worst, that they forsook the place of fight, leaving the wrack and spoils to the enemy, who nevertheless were fain to abandon presently even the passage which they had undertaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were forcibly crushed in the battle, and especially because they had received advertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylae. Before they weighed Anchors, Themistocles, General of the Athensians, engraved upon stone at the watering-place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should revolt unto the Greeks or stand neutral; (persecution, he hoped, would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.)

§ IV.

The attempt of Xerxes upon Apollo's Temple: and his taking of Athens.

WHEN Xerxes had past the straits of Thermopylae, he wasted the Country of the Boeotians, and the Regions adjoining; as for the Inhabitants, they chose rather to fly, and reserve themselves to a day of battle, than to adventure their lives into his hands, upon hope of saving their wealth, by making proffer unto him of their service. Part of his Army he sent to the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many Offerings that had been made by divers Kings, and great Personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventory than of the Goods left in his own Palace. To make relation of a great afflictment that fell upon the companies which arrived at the Temple to have sacked it, and of two Rocks that breaking from the Mount Parnassus, overwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure somewhat superfluous. Yet Hærodotus, who lived not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained even to his memory in the Temple of Misera, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he believed that Apollo was a god, he should not have dared to entertain a covetous desire of enriching himself by committing sacrilege upon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that license to chastise his impiety, in such manner as is reported, was granted unto the Devil, by that Holy one, who saith, Will a man spoil his Gods? and elsewhere; Have any Nation changed their Gods, which were not his Gods? Go to the Isles of Kittim, and behold, yet are not to Kedar and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleged the burning of Cybele's Temple by the Athensians, when they set fire on the City of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waft which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprize against Dolchos, this Vizzor of holy and zealous revenge falling off, discovered the face of covetousness so much the more ugly, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athensians had committed in that kind by meer mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus. He came to Athens, which finding forsaken, he took and burnt the Citadel and Temple, which was therein. The Citadel indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdom, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle; that Athens should be safe in wooden Walls, had fortified that place with boards and Palisades: too weak to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might have yielded it upon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied upon the prophesie: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present need, than fashioning the business to words.

§ V.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greeks to fight at Salamis.

THE Athensians had before the coming of Xerxes, removed their wives and children into Trezen, Ægina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedom, and the common liberty of Greece. Nevertheless this great zeal, which the Athensians did shew for the general good of their Country, was ill required by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they removed their wives and children out of the City. But when the City of Athens was taken, it was presently resolved upon, that they should forsake the Isle of Salamis, and withdraw the Fleet to Ithaca: which rock of land they did purpose to fortify against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponessus by Land and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece as indefensible to the fury of the Enemy. So should the Islands of Salamis and Ægina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athensians (which were there bestowed as in mercenary security) have been given over into the hands of the Barbarians. Against this resolution, Themistocles, Admiral of the Athensian Fleet, very strongly made opposition, but in vain. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with fear of losing their own, which they would not hazard, that no persuasions could obtain of them, to regard the estate of their distressed friends, and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made unto them, to allure them to abide the Enemy at Salamis; As first in private unto Eurybiades the Lacedæmonian, Admiral of the whole Fleet; That the self same fear, which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, upon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to discover the Fleet, and every one of the Confederates to withdraw himself to the defence of his own City and Estate: Then to the Council of War which Eurybiades upon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of Courage might work in them hereafter) he shewed that the fight at Ithaca was in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer Ships, to determine the matter in the straits; and that, besides the safeguard of Ægina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding, where they then were, sufficiently defend Ithaca, which the Barbarians should not so much as once look upon, if the Greeks obtained victory by Sea: which they could not so well hope for elsewhere, as in that present place which gave them so good advantage. All this would not serve to retain the Peloponnesians, of whom one, unworthy of memory, upbraided Themistocles with the loss of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speak in the Council, that had no Country of his own to inhabit. A base and shameful objection it was, to lay as a reproach that loss, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignity did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharp, as availed more than all his former persuasions. He told them all plainly, That the Athensians wanted not a fairer City, than any Nation of Greece could boast of; having well-near two hundred good ships of War, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was easy for them to transport their Families and subsistence into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure Habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refused to stand by them. Herewithal he mentioned a Town in Italy belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Town he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athensians in process of time should build it a-new, and there (quoth he) will we plant our selves, leaving unto you a sorrowful remembrance of my words, and of your own unthankfulness. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much began to enter into better consideration of the Athensians, whose affairs depended not, as they well perceived, upon so weak terms, that they should be driven to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might enforce the rest to yield to them, and confederate even to the uttermost of their own demands.

For the Athensians, when they first embraced that Heroical resolution of leaving their Grounds and Houses to Fire and Ruine, if necessity should enforce them so far, for the preservation of their Liberty; did employ the most of their private Wealth, and all the common Treasure, in building a great Navy. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well, that a strong Fleet would either procure Victory at Home, or a secure passage to any other Country. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships they did somewhat amend their Navy. Whereby it came to pass, that, had they been vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetual slavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athensians, whose forces by Sea did equal all theirs together; the whole consisting of no more than three hundred and four-score bottoms. Wherefore these Perlopesians began to suspect their own condition, which would have stood upon desperate points, if the Fleet of Athenians had forsaken them; were soon persuaded, by the greater fear of such a bad event, to forget the lesser, which they had conceived of the Perfians; and laying aside their insolent Bravery, they yielded to that most profitable Council of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Perfians consulted about giving battle: and how Themistocles by policy bid the Greeks to their resolution; with the Victory at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the mean season the Perfians had entred into Consultation, whether it were convenient to offer Battle to the Greeks, or no. The rest of the Captains giving such advice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soon agreed upon the Fight: but Artemisia Queen of Aegina, who followed Xerxes to this War in person, was of a contrary Opinion. Her Council was, that the King himself directly should march toward Perlopesia, whereby it would come to pass that the Greek Navy, (unable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of Provision) should presently be discovered, and every one seeking to preserve his own City and Goods, they should, being divided, prove unable to resist him, who had won so far upon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to give Battle, so on the other side the danger will be more (said she) which we shall undergo, than any need requireth us to adventure upon; and the Loss, in case it fall upon us, greater than the Profit of the Victory which we desire. For if we compel the Enemies to fly, it is no more than they would have done, we sitting still; but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put us to the worst, the Journey to Perlopesia is utterly dashed, and many that now declare for us, will soon revolt unto the Greeks. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the Fleet, related unto his Master the common Consent of the other Captains, and withal, this disagreeing Opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her Advice, yet resolved upon following the more general, but far worse Council of the rest; which would questionless have been the same which Artemisia gave, had not fear and flattery made all the Captains utter that as out of their own Judgment, which they thought most comfortable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed that Xerxes had entertained a vain persuasion of much good, that his own Presence upon the Shore to behold the Conflict, would work among the Soldiers. Therefore he incamped upon the Sea-side, pitching his own Tent upon the Mount Aegleus, which is opposite unto the Isle of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that Action, having Scribes about him to write down the Acts and Behaviour of every Captain. The near approach of the Barbarians, together with the News of that timorous Diligence, which their Countrymen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Perfian Army marching apace thither, did now again forrifice and amaze the Perlopesians, that no journey nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meer madness to fight for a Country already lost, when they rather should endeavour to save that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what misery would befall them, if losing the Victory, they should be driven into Salamis, there to be shut up, and besieged round in a poor desolate Island.

Hereupon they resolved forthwith to set sail for Isthmus: which had presently been done, if the Wisdom of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a violent Fear had stooped upon their ears against all good Council, did practise another course, and forthwith labour to prevent the execution of this unwholesome Decree; not suffering the very hour of performance to find him busied in wrangling altercation. As soon as the Council brake up, he dispatched secretly a trusty Gentleman to the Perfian Captains, informing them truly of the intended Flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Navy about the Island, which encompassing the Greeks might prevent their escape; giving them withal a false hope of his assistance. The Perfians no sooner heard than believed these good news, well knowing that the Victory was their own assured, if the Athenian Fleet joyned with them, which they might easily hope, considering what ability their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captains with rich Rewards, and the People with restitution of their City and Territories. By these means it fell out, that when the Greeks very early in the Morning were about to weigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Perfians, who had laboured hard all night, sending many of their Ships about the Isle of Salamis, to charge the Enemy in Rear, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Pisistale, which lieth over against Salamis, to save such of their own, and kill such of the Græcian Party, as by any misfortune should be cast upon the Shore. Thus did meer necessity enforce the Græcians to undertake the Battle in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable Victory, stemming the foremost of the Enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foul one upon another, could neither conveniently fight nor fly. I do not find any particular occurrences in this great Battle to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome task of writing down many Disasters that befel the Perfian Fleet, which ill acquired it self that day, doing no one peece of Service worthy the Presence of their King, or the registering of his Notaries. As for the Greeks, they might well seem to have wrought out that Victory with equal Courage, were it not that the principal Honour of that day was ascribed to those of Aegina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did fly towards Phalerus, where the Land-Army of Xerxes lay, the Ships of Aegina having possessed the Straights, did sink or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly give charge upon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

Of things following after the Battle of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

AFTER this Victory, the Greeks intending, by way of scrutiny, to determine which of the Captains had best merited of them, in all this great Service; every Captain, being ambitious of that Honour, did in the first place write down his own name, but in the second place, as best deserving next unto himself, almost every Suffrage did concur upon Themistocles. Thus private affection yielded unto virtue, as soon as her own turn was served. The Perfian King, as not amazed with this Calamity, began to make new preparation for continuance of War; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart, through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius, Author of the War, began to cast a wary Eye upon his Master, fearing lest his Council should be rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to adventure his life in pursuit of the Victory, than to cast it away by undergoing his Princes indignation; he advised the King to leave unto him three hundred thousand men, with which Forces he promised to reduce all Greece unto the subjection of the Perfian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to soothe Xerxes with many fair words; telling him, that the cowardice of those Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metal, nothing better than Slaves, who had so ill behaved themselves in the late Sea-Service, did not concern his Honour, who had always been Victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea, taken Athen itself, against which the War was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings ear, who presently betook himself to his Journey homeward, making the more haste, for that he understood, how the Greeks had a purpose to fill to Hellspont, and there to break down his Bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greeks had no such intent, but rather wished his hasty departure, knowing that he would leave his Army not so strong, as it should have been, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybides give Council that by no means they should attempt the breaking of that Bridge, lest Necessity should enforce the Perfians to take Courage, and rather to fight like Men, than die like Beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, under pretence of Friendship, send a false Advertisement to this timorous Prince, advising him to convey himself into Asia with all speed, before his Bridge were dissolved: which Council Xerxes took very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that he found the Bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torn in sunder by Tempests, and he thereby driven to Embark himself in some obscure Vessel, it is not greatly material; though the Greeks did most willingly embrace the latter of these reports. However it were, this flight of his did well ease the Country; that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of People, which as Locusts, had before overwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The Negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, at also between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians; after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had with-drawn himself into Theffaly, whence he sent Alexander, the Son of Amintas King of Macedon, as Embassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received, and of extending their Territories as far as their own desires; allowing them to retain their Liberty and Laws, if they would make Peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that War.

The Athenians had now re-entered their City, but not as yet brought back their Wives and Children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be secure, till the Army of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians, understanding what fair Conditions this Embassador would propound, were perplexed with very great fear. Lest he should find good and ready acceptance. Hereupon they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadors for Athen, who arriving, before the Macedonian had Audience, used the best of their persuasion to retain the Athenians firm. They alledged that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of War against the rest of Greece, but had only threatened the subversion of Athen, till they and all their Confederates Arming themselves in defence of that City, were drawn into the Quarrel, wherein the Athenians without much cruelty of injustice could not leave them. We know, if they that, they have endured great Calamities, losing the Fruit of the Grounds, and being driven to forsake the Town, the Houses whereof be ruined, and unfit for your Habitation; in regard whereof, we undertake to maintain as our own, your Wives and Children amongst us, as long as the War shall continue, hoping that ye, who have always procured Liberty to others, will not now go about to bring all Greece into Slavery and Bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oaths are of no assurance. It was needful to use many Arguments to the Athenians, who gave answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilst the Sun continued his course they would be Enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither Gold nor any Riches, with which he might seek to make purchase of their Liberty. Concerning the maintenance of their Wives and Children, it was a burden which they promised to sustain themselves, only desiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all speed they would cause their Army to march, for as much as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Theffaly, having once received such a peremptory answer. In this their Opinion of Mardonius his readiness to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For he, as soon as Alexander had returned their obdurate purpose of resistance, did forthwith lead his Army towards them, and their City: they having now the second time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more security abroad in the Country, where they expected the arrival of their Confederates.

From Athen he sent his Agent unto them with instructions, not only to persuade them to acceptance of the Conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principal of them to his party. His hope was that either the People, wearied with forsaking their Houses to often, would be desirous to preserve them from Fire, and to have those which were already laid waste, re-edified at the Kings charges: Or if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would rely upon their old Confederates, whose succours did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might be won with great Rewards, to draw them to his purpose; all which projects if they should fail, the destruction of Athens would be a good mean to please his Master King Xerxes, who must thereby needs understand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strong-cast part of their own Country. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demetrius calls him) Cypselus, advised the Senate to accept the Conditions, and propound them to the People; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Council-house heard what he had said, immediately fell upon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were fear or money, that had moved him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea, the Women of Athens in the file of Salamis, hearing of his bad Counsel, and bad conduct, assembling together, did enter his House there, and put his Wife and Children to the like Execution. All this bravery notwithstanding, when they perceived the slackness of the Peloponnesians in giving them aid, they were fain to be taken themselves to Salamis again, the old place of their security. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardness in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent very severe Messages to Sparta, complaining of their slackness, and threatening withal, to take such course as might stand best with their own good, seeing that the common effort of all was to little regarded. These Messengers were at the first entertained with dilatory answers, which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded athwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedaemonians waxed careless and dull, so the Athenians hotly pressed them to a quick resolution, giving them plainly to understand, that if they should hold on in their dilatory courses, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian Fleet lay upon the Coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer unto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Navy contained it self within the Harbours upon Europe side; both to do service where need should require at home; and withal to shun the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest had adventured over far. So mutual fear preserved in quiet the Islands lying in the midst of the Aegean Seas. But it was well and seasonably observed by a Counsellor of Sparta, that the Wall upon Isthmus would serve to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus; if once the Athenians gave ear to Mardonius: considering that many doors would be opened into that Demi-Island, as soon as the Enemy should by winning the Friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedaemonians upon this admonition, making better perusal of their own dangers, were very careful to give satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors, who not brooking their delays, were upon point of taking leave, yea, as it seemed, of renouncing their Alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans in the Evening, under conduct of Paulanias: they gave Audience the next day to the Embassadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readiness; deeply swearing that the Army of Sparta was already far upon the Journey; and giving them leave to take up other five thousand Lacedaemonians, out of the Region adjoining, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distastful such want of gravity, in a matter so important, were nevertheless contented with the final conclusion; and leaving the number appointed of Lacedaemonian Soldiers, made what haste they could to encamp in Attica. The other Grecians were nothing slack in sending forth Companies, whose near approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much disadvantage to Horle, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athens, tearing down the Walls of it, and running all that had formerly escaped the fury of War.

The great Battel of Plateæ.

IT was too long a rehearsal to shew all that happened in many Skirmishes between the Greeks and him, in the Country of Boeotia, which Mardonius had chosen to be the seat of that War. Much time was spent before the Quarrel was decided by trial of one main Battel: for both parties did stand upon their guard, each expecting when the other should assail them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Army; to whom were adjoined the Forces of Thibes, Macedony, Thebais, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persians, furnished his Camp with fifty thousand men. Against these the Lacedaemonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had levied an Army of one hundred and ten thousand, of which forty thousand were waightrily Armed, the rest were only Affiants to these forty thousand, being Armed more lightly, as rather to make excursions and give chase, than to sustain any strong charges.

These two Armies having eleven days confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of Service; Mardonius, whose Victuals began to fail, resolved to begin the fray. The Greeks were promised Victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the Plain of Ceres and Proserpina, making Prayers unto certain Gods, Demi-Gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to find the certain place which the Oracle designed. For the Plain of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, near unto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorials of those Nymphs, and Demi-Gods, were in the same place, upon Mount Citheron, and the ground served well for foot-men against Horle; only the Land belonged unto the Plateans, and not unto the Athenians.

Whilst the Greeks were perplexed about the Interpretation of this doubtful Oracle, the Plateans, to make all clear, did freely bestow their Land on that side the Town upon the Athenians.

This Magnificence of the Plateans caused Alexander the Great, many Ages after, to re-edify their City, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian Wars.

All things being ready for Battel; the Lacedaemonian General thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertain the Thebans and other Greeks which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them often-times before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedaemonians; which Mardonius understanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose Valour the Medes and Persians had felt heavy proof, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the bravest Souldiers of Greece) he did also change the order of his Battel, and oppose himself to Paulanias. All the Greeks might perceive how the Enemy did shift his wings, and Paulanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on Horle-back, who did to molest the Greeks at their Watering-place, that they were fain to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much loss to themselves, and none to the Enemy, lie near to that Fountain which did serve all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Army being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the Morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their fight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of meer Cowardice) he charged them in the Rear with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient Valour, that the Lacedaemonians being over-taken by the Enemies Horle, and over-whelmed with great flights of Arrows, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for Victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slain, and some of special mark lost, before any sign of good success appeared in the entrails.

But as soon as Paulanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the Superstition of that Age and Country accounted fortunate; he gave the Signal of Battel: and thereupon the Souldiers, who did then sit up on the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging upon them without any fear of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greek Army that was in march, being revoked by Paulanias, came in apace to succour the Lacedaemonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive unto the place of the great Battel, because the Thebans, and other Greeks confederated with the Persians, gave them check by the way. Nevertheless, the Spartans, with other their Affiliates, did to well acquit themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slain in the Field; the rest fled into the Camp, which they had fortified with wooden Walls, and there defended themselves with such Courage as desperate Necessity enforced them unto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedaemonians were not acquainted with the manner of Assaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the mean season the Athenians, having found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thebaisians, did with much labour and courage obtain Victory, which having not long pursued, they came to help the Lacedaemonians, whom they found wearily busied in Assaulting the Camp, with more Valour than Skill. Wherefore they themselves undertook it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall, which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greeks entered, with such fury, and just desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are slain, nor to have left three thousand alive, excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when the Persian Army first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especial cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Camp. For though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it, greater than of the Affiliates; yet they being of several Nations and Languages, and having lost their General with other principal Commanders, it was impossible that they in such a terror and astonishment should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemies Country, against an Army of men far more Valiant than themselves, and inflamed with present Victory. Therefore the same Wall which for a few hours had preserved their lives, by holding out the Enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the slaughtering fury of unpitiful Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the People of Thebais, and other Countries in his way, That he was sent by Mardonius upon some piece of Service: For he well knew, that had they understood any thing of that great difcomfiture, all places would have been hostile unto him, and fought with his ruin to purchase favour of the vanquishers. Therefore making for large Marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behind and lost, he came to Byzantium, whence he shipped his men over into Asia. Such was the end of the vain-glorious expedition, undertaken by Xerxes against the Greeks, upon hope of Honour, and great Conquest; though forcing otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had foreseen, and rather worse, for as much as it began the Quarrel, which never ended, before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected, by that Nation of the Greeks despised and fought to have been brought into Slavery. Hereby it may seem, that the Vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himself, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subversion of the Persian Monarchy by the Greeks, who thus provoked, entered into greater consideration of their own strength, and the weakness of their Enemies.

The Battel of Mycale, with a strange Accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and Examples of the like.

THE same day on which the Battel was fought at Plateæ, there was another Battel fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian Fleet rode. Lewischides the Spartan, with Xanthippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greek Navy, at the request of some Islanders and Ionians, did fall into those parts, to deliver the Semians, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himself at this time lay at Sardis, a City in Lydia, not far from the Sea-side, having left therefore thousand under the Command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artabazus and Iphicrates, Admirals of the Persian Fleet, understood that the Greeks bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their Ships a ground, fortifying with Palisades and otherwise, as much ground as did seem needful for the encamping of all their Land and Sea-forces. Lewischides at his arrival, perceiving that they meant to keep within their strength, and resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his Gally close aboard the the Shore, and called upon the Ionians (who more for fear than good will were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greek Tongue to remember Liberty, and use the fair occasion which they now had to recover it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Eubœa; trusting that either these persuasions would prevail; or if the Persians did happen to understand them, that it would breed some jealousy in them, causing them to fight in fear of their own Compagnions. It need not seem strange, that this very fame stratagem, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, did now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty, to persuade those Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now, in his declining Estate, gave a willing ear to the sweet sound of Liberty. The Persians likewise, who in their former Bravery, little regarded, and less feared any Treason, to be contrived by their Subjects, were now so wary, that from the Semians, which were amongst them, they took away their Arms; the Milefians, whom they did suspect, but would not seem to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence, of the fraught Passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milefians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Semians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, took courage in the heat of the Fight, and laying hold upon such Weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Camp; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to have found some that durst begin. It is said, that whilst the Greeks were yet in march towards the Enemies Camp, a Rumor suddenly ran in the Army that Mardonius was overthrown in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captains to encourage the Soldiers) was very true. For the Battle of Platœa was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

The like report, of that great Battle, wherein Paulus Æmilius overthrew Perseus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in four days, as Livie with others do record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kind. As that of the Battle by the River Sagra in Italy, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnese: That of the Battle against the Tarquinians and the Laines, presently notified at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the Victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebel to Domitian the Emperor. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germany, had corrupted his Army with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himself Emperor; which news much troubling the City of Rome, with fear of a dangerous War; it was suddenly reported that Antonius was slain, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the Gods, and show all manner of public joy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Author of these tidings could not be found, the Emperor Domitian betook himself to his Journey against the Rebel; and being with his Army in March, he received advertisement by Post, of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembering the Rumour notified before in Rome, of the self same Victory, he found that the Report and Victory were born upon one day, though twenty thousand Furlongs (which make about five and twenty hundred Miles) asunder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example gives credit unto many the like. And indeed it was very strange, if among so many Rumours, begotten by forged or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not be found (as happens in Dreams among many thousand vain and frivolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit we may find, that God himself doth sometimes use to terrify those who presume upon their own strength, by these light means of tumultuous Noises; as he rallied the Siege of Samarra, by causing a found of Horles and Charlots to affright the Assyrians; and as he threatened Senacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a Ra-phail upon him, and he shall bear a wound, and return to his own Land. Wherefore it may well have been true, that God was pleased by such a mean as this, to animate the Greeks; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavy hearts, being in great fear, least their own adventure should by no means fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their Country of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius, whilst they went wandering to seek out Enemies afar off, upon the Coast of Asia. But the fame of the Battle fought at Platœa being noised among them; every man desired that his own Valour in the present Fight, might be some help to work out the full deliverance of Greece. In this alacrity of spirit, they divided themselves into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plain, directly towards the Enemies Camp; the Lacedæmonians conducted the other, by the Mountains and straight Passages, to win the higher Ground. The Athenians did first for the Camp (ere the Lacedæmonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palisadoes and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the Place, slaying all that could not save themselves by flight. In this Fight the Semians did good Service, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milefians, who upon the like jealousies, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the Passages; did now (as if they had been set on purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the Sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except a very few, that fled through by-paths. The Lacedæmonians that day did little service, for the business was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such Companies as retired in whole Troops; making them fly dispersed in very much disorder, where by the Milefians were enabled to do the greater execution upon them. This was the last Fight of that huge Army levied against Greece, which was now utterly broken, and had no means left to make offensive War.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous quality of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian Affairs, to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

XERXES lay at Sardis, not far from the place of this Battle; but little mind had he to revenge either this or other his great Losses, being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom, when he could not prevail by intreaty, nor would obtain his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her Husband, he thought it best to make a March between his own Son Darius and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to find occasion of such familiarity, as might work out his Desire. But whether it were so, that the Chastity of the Mother did still reject him, or the Beauty of her Daughter allure him; he soon after fell in love with his own Sons Wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to govern himself in Peace, as to guide his Army in War. This young Lady having once desired the King to give her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his own Wife; caused the Queen thereby to perceive her Husbands Conversation with her, which the imputed not so much to the Beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the Cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon the conceived extremest hatred. Therefore at a Royal Feast, wherein the Custom was that the King should grant every Request, he craved that the Wife of Majestes, her Husbands Brother, the young Ladies Mother, might be given into her Disposition. The barbarous King, who might either have reformed the Abuse of such a Custom, or have deluded the Importunate Cruelty of his Wife, by threatening her self with the like, to whatsoever she should inflict upon the innocent Lady, granted the Request, and sending for his Brother persuaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seems, that he understood how villainously that poor Lady should be treated, whom he knew to be virtuous, and whom himself had loved. Majestes refused to put her away; alleging his own Love, her deserving, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Son, as reasons important to move him to keep her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reviled him; saying, That he now should neither keep the Wife which he had, nor have his Daughter whom he had promised unto him. Majestes was much grieved with these words, but much more, when returning Home, he found his Wife most brutally mangled by the Queen Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Ears, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast unto Dogs. Majestes enraged with this Villany, took his way with his Children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Province he was Governour, intending to rebel and avenge himself. But Xerxes understanding his purpose, caused an Army to be levied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the Sword. Such was the tyrannical condition of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is joined with absolute Power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much Virtue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his overthrown, and lying upon the Ground, said, That he doubted, whether, in regard of his Virtue, he should again erect it, or, for the Mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lye. But surely whatsoever his other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a Coward, and consequently merciles.

Therefore we may firmly believe, that the Virtue of Cyrus was very great, upon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so firmly laid, that all the Wickedness and Vanities of Xerxes, and other worse Princes, could not overthrow it, until it was broken by a Virtue almost equal to that which did establish it. In Wars against the Ægyptians, the Fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had been very good; but against the general Estate of Greece, neither he, nor any of his Posterity, did ever make offensive War, but received many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mycale served but as an Introduction; teaching the Greeks, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Soldier at his own doors, than in a foreign Country: whereof good trial was made forthwith, and much better proof as soon as the Affairs of Athen were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the History of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the Estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian Estate continued in her Greatness many Ages following, in such wise, that the known parts of the World had no other Kingdom representing the Majesty of a great Empire.

But this greatness depended only upon the Riches and Power that had formerly been acquired, yielding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxury, wherewith both it, and all, or the most of Empires that ever were, have been enervated, made unweildy, and (as it were) farned for the hungry Swords of poor and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to pass, that Xerxes and his Successors were fain to defend their Crowns with money and safe Policies; very seldom or never (unless it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the trial of plain Battle with that little Nation of Greece, which would soon have ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private Malice and Jealousie urged every City to envy the height of her Neighbours Walls, and thereby diverted the Swords of the Greeks into their own Bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better have continued to hew out the way of Conquest on the side of Asia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian War to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

§. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

After that the Medes and Persians had received their last Blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycale: Leuctides, who then commanded the Grecian Army, leaving the pursuit of the War to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedæmonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta, and other places, out of which they had been expelled. The Athenians in the mean while besieged Sepos, a City on the Straight of the Hellepont, between which and Abydos, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the Inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greeks, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellepont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their Wives and Children, since the Invasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Attica, in divers Islands; and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their own places.

And though the most part of all their Houses in Athens were burnt and broken down, and the Walls of the City over-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and so fortified their City, before they cared to cover themselves, their Wives and Children, with any private Buildings: Whereof the Lacedæmonians being advertised, and mistaking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their own City of Sparta was unwall'd, as also because the Athenians were grown more powerful by Sea, than either themselves or any other State of Greece, they dispatched Messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any private milike or jealousy, but pretending, that if the Persians should return to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serve to receive their Enemies, and to be made a Seat for the War, as Thebes had lately been. To this the Athenians promised to give them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily. But being resolved to go on with their Works by the advice of Themistocles, they told the Lacedæmonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their Walls to that height, as they cared not for their milikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (so gain time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedæmon, giving him for excuse, that he could not deliver the Athenians resolutions, till the arrival of his Fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedæmonians expectation being converted into jealousy (for by the arrival of divers persons out of Attica, they were told for certain, that the Walls of Athens were speedily grown up beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to believe Reports and vain Rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trusty Citizens to Athens, from whose Relation they might resolve themselves, and determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his own, by whom he advised the Athenians, first to entertain the Lacedæmonians with some such discourse as might retain them a few days, and in conclusion to hold them among them till himself and the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their Liberty also to return. Which done, and being also assured by his Associates and Arifides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedæmonians know, That it was true, that the Walls of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedæmonians to believe, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such, as right well understood what appertained to a Common-weal and their own Safety, without direction and advice from any other: That they had in the War of Xerxes abandoned their City, and committed themselves to the wooden Walls of their Ships, from the resolution of their own Counsels and Courage, and not thereto taught or persuaded by others: and finally, in all that perilous War against the Persians, they found their own Judgments, and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or less fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Common-wealth among the Greeks; and therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Judges of their own Affairs, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confederated within Greece should be left open, or else that the Wall of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedæmonians finding the time unfit for quarrel, dissembled their milike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the Division, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received back from them their own Embassadors.

The Walls of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pireus, by which they might under convert imbarck themselves upon all occasions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatness, and prosperous Wars made by that State upon the Persian.

The Athenians having settled things in good order at Home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the War against the Persians, to which the Lacedæmonians added other twenty; and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sail for Cyprus, under the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedæmonian; where after their landing, having possit themselves of many principal places, they imbarcked the Army again, and took land in Thrace, recovering from the Persians by force the City Bizantium, now Constantinople:

Constantinople: from whence, Pausanias behaving himself more like a Tyrant than a Captain, especially towards the Ionians, lately revolted from Xerxes, was called back by the Council of Lacedæmon, and not only accused of many insolent Behaviors, but of Intelligence with the Medes, and Treason against his Country. In his stead they employed Darius, who either gave the same cause of offence, or else the Athenians, who affected the first Commandment in that War, practised the Soldiers to complain; though indeed the wife and virtuous Behaviour of Arifides, General of the Athenian Forces, a man of rare and incomparable sincerity, had been able to make a good Commander seem ill in comparison of himself; and therefore was much more available in rendering those detected, whose Vices afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedæmonians being no less weary of the War, than the Athenians were eager to pursue it, the one obtained their Ease, and the other the Execution and Honor, which they desired: for all the Greeks (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the Commandment of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their Greatness in that present Age, and of their Ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the War being now committed unto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities, they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, and began to levy Money according to their Discretion, for the Maintenance of the general Defence of Greece, and for the recovering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the less, and the Islands, from the Persians. This Tribute (the first that was ever paid by the Greeks) amounted to four hundred and threescore Talents, which was raised easily by the honest care of that just man Arifides, to whose discretion all the Confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complain of him. But as the Virtue of Arifides, and other worthy Citizens, brought unto the Athenians great Commodity; so the desire which they conceived of encreasing their Commodity, corrupted their Vertue, and robbing them of the general Love which had made them powerful, abandoned their City to the defence of her Treasurer, which with her in the next Age perished. For it was not long ere these four hundred and threescore Talents were raised to six hundred, nor long after that, ere their covetous Tyranny had converted their Followers into Slaves, and extorted from them yearly thirteen hundred Talents. The Isle of Delos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these Sums were laid up; and where, at the general Assembly, the Captains of those Forces, sent by the Confederates, were for Form sake called to Consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by Sea than all Greece besides, had lockt up the common Treasure in an Island under their own Protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The general Commander in this War, was Cimon the Son of Miltiades, who first took Eion, upon the River Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Caristij, and brought into servitude the Naxij, contrary to the form of the Confederacy: So did they other the Inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their Contribution, or disobeyed their Commandments; taking upon them and usurping a kind of sovereign Authority over the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the War in their own Persons, and given up altogether to their ease, made choice rather to pay their parts in Money, than either in Men of War, or in Ships; leaving the provision of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weak in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Wars; the other greatly strengthened their Navy and their Experiences, being always armed and employed in Honourable Services, at the cost of those, who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their foot-men. Yet was the Tribute-money, levied upon these their Confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded upon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well Manned, wherewith Cimon the Admiral scouring the Asiatick Seas, took in the City of Phaselis; which having formerly pretended Neutrality, and refused to relieve, or any way assist the Greeks, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a Fine, and to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence he set sail for the River Euxymedon in Pemphylia, where the Persian Fleet rode, being of six hundred Sail, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fifty; and having a great Land-Army, encamped upon the shore: All which Forces having been provided for advancing the Kings affairs in Greece, were utterly defeated in one day, and two hundred Ships taken by the Athenians, the rest being broken to pieces, or sunk, ere ever they had swam in the Greeklisk Seas. Cimon having in one day obtained two great Victories, the one by Sea, and the other by Land, was very soon presented with a third. For four-score Sail of Pharacians (who were the best of all Sea-men, under the Persian Command) thinking to have joyined themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arrived upon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing less than what ensued. Upon the first notice of their approach Cimon weighed Anchor, and meeting them at an Head-Land, called Hydra, did so amaze them, that they only sought to run themselves on ground; by which means preserving few of their Men, they lost all their Ships. These losses did so break the Courage of the Persian, that, omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condescended to whatsoever Articles it pleased the Athenians to propound, granting liberty unto all the Greeks inhabiting Asia; and further Covenanting, That none of his Ships of War should fail to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyanea and Cebelidonia.

This was the most Honourable Peace that ever the Greeks made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any War that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till such time as, under Alexander, they overthrew the Empire of Persia; in which War few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great Command, but served altogether under the Macedonians.

§. III.

The Death of Xerxes by the Treason of Artabanus.

Besides these losses, which could not easily have been repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gave just cause to the Persian of seeking Peace upon any terms not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the Uncle of Xerxes, perceiving that the King his Master did easily easily take small occasions to shed the Blood of such, as in Kindred or Place were near unto him, began to repose less hope of safety in remaining faithful, than of obtaining the Sovereignty, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his Cruelty, and despised for his Cowardice and Misfortunes. Having conceived this Treason, he found means to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himself had been innocent) he accused Darius the Son of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer Death as a Parricide. Who-ther it be true, that by this great Wickedness he got the Kingdom, and held it seven Months; or whether intending the like evil to Artaxerxes the Son of Xerxes, he was by him prevented and surprized, it were hard to affirm any certainty. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken he was, and with his whole Family put to Death by extreme Torments, according to the sentence, whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verse.

Deservit pede pena claudo.*

Seldom the Villain, though much haste he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance fails to overtake.

§. IV.

The Banishment of Themistocles: His flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Persia; and his Death.

ARTAXERXES being established in his Kingdom, and having to compound with the Athenians, as the present necessity of his affairs required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune against the Greeks, than he or his Predecessors had ever hitherto found. For the People of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their own merits in that service, that they not only thought it fit for themselves to become the Commanders over many Towns and Islands of the Greeks, but, even within their own Walls, they would admit none other form of Government than merely Democratical. Herein they were so insolent, that no integrity nor good desert was able to preserve the Estate of any such as had born great Office, longer than, by flattering the rascal multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanor much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had laid the foundations of his greatness upon Popularity, yet now presuming upon his good services done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to check their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had received from him, that they laid upon him the punishment of Ostracism, whereby he was banished for ten years, as a man over-burthened to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his return was half expired, a new Accusation was brought against him by the Lacedæmonians, who charged him of consulting Paulanias, about betraying the whole Country of Greece unto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty Cities, was driven, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous removings, to adventure himself into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceived of advancing his Affairs by the Council and Assistance of Themistocles, proved altogether fruitless. For when the Athenians, in favour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infected Egypt, causing it to rebel against the Persians) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Army in Egypt, and crowning those Eastern Seas, to the great hindrance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of that Peace, which to their great Honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King lend his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had given, of assuring the Persian Estate against the Greeks.

But whether Themistocles perceived much unlikelihood of good success, in leading a great Army of daftardly Persians against the Warlike People of Greece; or else (as in favour of his virtue it is more commonly reported) the loss of his Country would not permit him to seek Honour by the ruin of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to undertake the conduct of great Forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict between thankfulness to his well-deserving Prince, and natural affection to his own ill-deserving People, by finishing his life with a cup of Poison.

§. V.

*How the Athenians, breaking the Peace, which to their great Honour they had made with the Persians, were justly beaten in Egypt.*

THIS was Artaxerxes, driven to use the service of his own Captains in the Egyptian War, wherein it appeared well, That a just cause is a good defence against a strong Enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred Sail fringed was sent forth under Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which Conquest seemed easy both to make and to maintain, the Persian being utterly broken at Sea, and thereby unable to relieve the Island. Now although it were so, that a Peace had been concluded, which was likely to have been kept sincerely by the Persians, who had made so good proof of the Grecian Valour, that he was nothing detestful to build any Ships of War (without which the Greeks could receive no harm from him) whereof if any one should be found sailing towards Greece, the Peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole Estate; yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an Enemy too far over-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the League which in his own worse fortunes he had made with them, he would break in theirs; and therefore fought to get such assurance into their hands, as might utterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their Revenues and Power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure Honour by Profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilst they might, whatsoever they were able to get and hold, and he unable to defend.

The Isle of Cyprus lying in the bottom of the Straights between Cilicia, Syria, and Egypt; is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seek to enrich himself by Trade with those Countries, or to insist one or more of them when they are his Enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already devoured, in conceit, this Island, was on the sudden wholly choked with a greater morsel, to snatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily have swallowed lowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Egypt, having found how greatly the Country was exasperated by the late Wars, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian Garrisons, conceived rightly, that if such small Forces as the Sarapa or Viceroy could make on the sudden of his own Guards, or levy out of the ordinary Country, were by him defaced, the naturals of the Country, not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a revolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soon break faith with him who had no other Title to that Kingdom than a good Sword. Further, he persuaded himself that the People, unable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance, would easily be drawn to accept him, the Author of their deliverance, for King. Neither did this hope deceive him: For having taken and cruelly slain Achamenes the Viceroy, divers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclaiming him King, shewed the most of their endeavour for prosecution of the War. But he considering his own weakness, and that the means of the Egyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceived well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, far greater Forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price soever he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian Fleet, and knowing well the virtue of the Soldiers therein embarked; he invited the Commanders to share with him the Kingdom of Egypt as a far greater Reward of their Adventure, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their Estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly forced according to their expectation) would have been contented with an equal share, and not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination unnecessary. He was possessed of the Peoples love, they were of most power. But the illuse of those affairs was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally. Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good as hopeful success: For they entered the Land as far as to Mempbis, the principal City; and of the City it self they took two parts: to the third part, which was called the White Wall, they laid such hard Siege, that neither those Forces of the Persians, which then were in Egypt, were strong enough to remove them; neither could Artaxerxes well devise what means to use for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by setting the Lacedæmonians upon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to look home-wards to their own defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure Assistance of the Greeks one against the other, by stirring them up with Gold to the entertainment of private Quarrels, for the good of their common Enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expense, finding that the Lacedæmonians were nothing forward in employing their whole Force against the Athenians, whom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Army in Egypt; he thought it his wisest way to employ the rest of his money and means to their relief, who had now the space of six years defended his Masters right in Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his Name, the Son of Cyprus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountered by the revolted People; over whom he obtained a Victory, which made him Master of the Country, whilst the Athenians lay busied about Mempbis the great City. It cannot be doubted, but that long abode in a strange Air, and want of supply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: Sure it is, that when Megabazus, having reduced the Country to Obedience, attempted the City it self, whether his former success had amended the Courage of the Persians, or want of Necessaries made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Mempbis, and purified them so near, as they were forced to fortify themselves in the Isle of Protophis, where Megabazus, after eighteen Months Siege, turning away one part of the River by divers Trenches, assailed the Athenians without impediment of Waters, took their Gallies, and put all to the Sword, save a few that saved themselves by flight into Libya; the same Entertainment had fifty other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Army was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesum, and fell unawares between the Phœnician Gallies and the Persian in the Army; so as the Persians recovered all Egypt, but mouth of that part held by Ammyrtus, and Inarus the King of Libya, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenian six years War in Egypt, and the reward of their vanity and indiscretion to undertake many Enterprizes at once.

§. VI.

Of other Wars made by the Athenians for the most part with good success, about the same time.

NOTWITHSTANDING these overthrow in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-wars waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their Forces against the Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten near unto Hadra by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great Victories soon after; the one over the Poloponnesians, near unto Cephallenia; the other over the Ægians, near unto Ægina; where they sunk and carried away threefore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their Forces on the sudden, and besieged Ægina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great Fight, with equal loss, the Corinthians, when they returned again to sit up their Trophy, as Victors in the former Battle, were utterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons, and Megarians, to their great loss and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited near to Tanagra by the Lacedæmonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians, (at which time the Thebanian Horse-men turned from their Allies, the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threefore days after, the Athenians entred Bœotia under the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they won Phocis on the Gulf Oreum, and evened the Walls of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render upon most base Conditions; as to beat down the Walls of their City, and give them Hostages for Tribute; the Siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these Victories, they sack'd and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Poloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians; wan upon the Corinthians, and overthrow the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the undertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those six years that a part of their Forces made War in Ægypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thebais, perished thereunto by Orestes, but were reſcued by the King Pharaulis, who had charged Orestes out of his Dominions. They alſo Landed in Syonia, and had Victory over thoſe that reſiſted; after which, they made Truce with the Peloponneſians for five years, and ſent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred Ships, but they were again allured by Amrytus, one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Mariſh and Woody parts of Ægypt from the Perſians, to whom they ſent fifty of their Ships. The reſt of their Army falling in their enterpriſe of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coaſted the Iſland, encountered a Fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned Victorious into Greece; as alſo thoſe returned ſafe which were ſent into Ægypt.

§. VII.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahaſuerus, the Husband of Queen Heſter.

THEſe Ægyptian troubles being ended, the Reign of Artaxerxes continued peaceable, whereof the length is by ſome reſtrained to twenty years, but the more and better Authors give him forty ſome allow unto him four and forty. He was a Prince of much Humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleneſs. His favour was exceeding great to the Jews, as appears by the Hiſtories of Eſdras and Nehemiah, which fell in his time.

To prove that this was the King who gave countenance and aid to that great Work of Building the Temple, it were a needleſs travel; conſidering that all the late Divines have taking very much pain, to ſhew, That thoſe two Prophets were licenſed by him, and ſuccoured in that Building, in ſuch fort as appears in their Writings.

This was likewiſe that King Ahaſuerus who Married Heſter. Whereof if it be needful to give proof, it may ſuffice; That Ahaſuerus lived in Suſa, reigning from India to Æthiopia, and therefore muſt have been a Perſian; That he lived in Peace, as appears by the circumſtances of the Hiſtory, and uſed the Council of the ſeven Princes, the Authority of which Princes began under Darius, the Son of Hymphaſis; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambuſis.

The continual Wars which exerciſed King Darius, the Son of Hyſtaſpes, together with the certainty of his Marriages with ſundry Wives, from none of whom he was Divorced, but left his fiſt Wife Aſta, the Daughter of Cyrus, alive in great Honour, being Mother to Xerxes the ſucceeding King; do manifeſtly prove that Heſter was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew. That at the perſuaſion of Mardochæus, Joaſachim the High Prieſt, the Son of Jefſus, cauſed the Feaſt of Purim to be inſtituted in memory of that deliverance. Now the time of Joaſachim was in the Reign of Artaxerxes, at the coming of Eſdras and Nehemiah: Jefſus his Father dying about the end of Darius.

The ſame continuance of Wars, with other his furious and Tragical Loves, wherewith Xerxes did conſume ſuch little time as he had free from War, are enough to prove, that the ſtory of Heſter pertained not unto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twenty years, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahaſuerus or Artaxerxes is expreſſed by Ne- hemias. Again, it is well known, that Xerxes in the ſeventh year of his Reign (wherein this Marriage muſt have been celebrated) came not near to Suſa. Of the Princes that ſucceeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prove that none of them could be Ahaſuerus, it is enough to ſay, that Mardochæus having been carried from Hieruſalem Captive, with Techomis, by Nebuchadnezzar, was unlikely to have lived into their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Suſa, Reigned from India to Æthiopia, lived in Peace, was contemporary with Joaſachim the High Prieſt: And further, he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the Rebellious Ægyptians in that ſeventh year of his Reign; which good fortune might well give occaſion to ſuch a Royal Feaſt as is deſcribed in the beginning of the Book of Heſter. This is the ſum of the Arguments, brought to prove the Age of Heſter's ſtory by the learned and diligent Krentzheimus, who adds the Authorities of Joſephus, affirming the ſame, and of Philo, giving to Mardochæus eighteen years more than Jaeſe the Patriarch lived; namely, one hundred fourſcore and eighteen years in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth year of this Artaxerxes, if we ſuppoſe him to have been carried away Captive, being a Boy of ten years old.

§. VIII.

Of the Troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponneſian War.

BUT it is fit that we now return to the Affairs of the Greeks, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their Civil Wars, ſuffered the Perſians for many Ages to reſt in Peace, this Ægyptian Expedition being come to nought. Soon after this, the Lacedæmonians undertook the War, called Sacred, recovered the Temple and Iſle of Delphos, and delivered both to the Inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the ſame, and gave it in charge to the Phœnicians. In the mean while the Banished Boeotians re-entred their own Land, and maſtered two of their own Towns poſſeſſed by the Athenians, which they ſoon recovered again from them; but in their return towards Athens, the Boeotians, Eubeans, and Loceans, (Nations oppreſſed by the Athenians) ſet upon them with ſuch reſolution, as the Athenians were in that Fight all ſlain or taken, whereby the Boeotians recovered their former Liberty, reſtoring to the Athenians their Priſoners. The Iſlanders of Eubœa took ſuch Courage upon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertiſed that the Megarians (who fiſt left the Lacedæmonians, and ſubmitted themſelves to Athens) being now weary of their Yoke, had ſlain the Athenian Garriſons, and joined themſelves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epilaurians. Theſe News haſtened Pericles home ward with all poſſible ſpeed; but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponneſians, led by Phylaxmas, the Son of Paulonias, had invaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whose return Pericles went on with his fiſt intent, and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of Peace with the Peloponneſians, and yielded to deliver up all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponneſus; and this Truce was made for thirty years. After fix of theſe years were expired, the Athenians (favouring the Mileſians againſt the Samiens) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulſes, and ſome great loſſes, both both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forced to yield themſelves upon moſt lamentable Conditions; Namely, to deliver up all their Ships, to break down their own Walls, to pay the charge of the War, and to reſtore whatever had been taken by themſelves, or by their practice, from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruel Peloponneſian War, whereof I have gathered this Brief following; the ſame contention taking beginning fifty years after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But becauſe there was no City thereof, which either in the beginning of this War, or in the continuance of it, was not drawn into the Quarrel, I hold it convenient now at the fiſt to ſhew briefly the eſtate of the Country at that time, and eſpecially the condition of thoſe two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, upon which all the reſt had moſt dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponneſian War.

§. I.

Upon what terms the two principal Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood, at the beginning of the Peloponneſian War.

GREECE was never united under the Government of any one Prince or Eſtate, until Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Union and League againſt the Perſians, whereof they were Captains, than into any abſolute ſubjection. For every Eſtate held their own, and were Governed by Laws far different, and by their own Magiſtrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yield Obedience no otherwiſe than as to ſuch, who were (perforce) their Leaders in the Perſian War (deemed the General Quarrel of Greece) and took the Profit and Honour of the Victory to their own uſe and increaſe of greatneſs. But the Kings which afterwards Reigned in Macedonia, did ſo far enlarge their Authority, that all Greece was by them brought under ſuch Obedience, as differed little from Servitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, ſometimes with Arms, and ſometimes with gifts, preſerve their Liberty; of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chief: which two People deſerved beſt the Plague of Tyranny, having fiſt given occaſion thereunto, by their great Ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Country by perpetual War. For until theſe two Cities of Athens and Sparta diſtracted all Greece, drawing every State into the Quarrel, on the one or other ſide, and ſo gave beginning to the Peloponneſian War (the effects whereof in true eſtimation ceaſed not, before the time that Philip had overmaſtered all, forſomuch as every conſolation of one War afforded henceforth matter to ſome new diſtraction of the whole Country) the Wars, commenced between one City of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All Controverſies were ſoon decided, either by the Authority of the Amphictyons, who were the General Council of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whoſe Aid was commonly held as good as the aſſurance of Victory.

Theſe Lacedæmonians had lived about four hundred years under one form of Government, when the Peloponneſian War began. Their Education was only to praſtice feats of Arms; wherein they fo excelled, that a very few of them were thought equal to very great numbers of any other People. They were poor, and cared not much for Wealth; every one had an equal portion of the common Field, which ſufficed to maintain him in ſuch manner of life as they uſed. For Bravery they had none, and curious Building or Apparel they regarded not. Their Diet was ſimple, their Feaſts and ordinary Meals being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They uſed Money of Iron, whereof they could not be covetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Utopian-like, ſave that they uſed no other Occupation than War, placing all their Felicity in the glory of their Valour. Hereby it came to paſs that in all Enterpriſes, whereof they were partakers, the Leading and High Command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their Conduſt. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this: For they fought Wealth, and meaſured the Honours of their Victories by the Profit; they uſed mercenary Souldiers in their Wars, and exacted great Tribute of their Subjects, which were for the moſt part Iſlanders, compelled to obey them, becauſe the Athenian Fleet was great.

As in form of Policy, and in courſe of Life, ſo in Conditions Natural, the difference between theſe two People was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, ſudden in their conſultations, and as haſty in the execution: The Lacedæmonians very flow in their deliberations, full of gravity, but very reſolute, and ſuch as would in cold Blood perform what the Athenians did uſually in ſeize. Whereby it came to paſs that the Lacedæmonians had all the Eſtates of Greece depending upon them, as on men firm and aſſured, that fought Honour and not Riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by ſuch as obeyed them perforce, being held in ſtraight ſubjection. But the Signory of the Athenians was nothing large, until ſuch time as the Perſian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a Quarrel to Athens. For then the Citizens perceiving well, that the Town of Athens could not be defended againſt his great Army of ſeventeen hundred thouſand Men, beſetwom all their Wealth upon a Navy, and (aſſiſted by the other Greeks) overthrew the Fleet of Xerxes, whoſe Land-forces were ſoon after diſcomfited by the Spartans. After theſe Victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in Fleet, reduced all the Iſlands of the Greekiſh Seas under their Obedience; impoſing upon them a hard Tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of War against the Perjans; though indeed they employed their Forces chiefly, to the Conquest of such Islands, and Haven-Towns, of their own Country-men, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedæmonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in Expeditions to be made far from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jealousy, and were very apt to quarrel with them; but much more willing to breed contention between them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Tekans would have opposed the Plataeans, when they of Plataea were no paired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other Aid, than this Advice, That they should seek the help at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be entangled in a long and tedious War with their Neighbours of Thetis. But it proved otherwise; for their Force was now so great, that all such occasions did only serve to increase their Honour and Puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entered into War.

NEvertheless many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, because that City grew very insolent upon sudden prosperity, and maintaining the weaker Towns against the stronger, incroached apace upon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much incensed, because the People of the Island Coryra, their Colony, which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their Fleet by adjoining that of Coryra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that Revenge which else they would have taken. Now, howsoever it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the Conditions of Peace agreed upon among the Greeks, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redress by War the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking Religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain Offences committed against the Gods; whereof having for Answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like Offences, committed in Sparta; they began to deal plainly, and required that the People of some Towns, oppressed by the Estate of Athens, should be set at Liberty; and that a Decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reversed. This last point they so earnestly pressed, that if they might obtain it, they promised to abstain from their purpose of making War.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their Reputation without entering into a War, which threatened them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to undergo.

But the Athenians would yield to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how far they were from fear of any other City. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needful to the War; where, in the Lacedæmonians were Superior, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece; and having the general favour, as men that pretended to set at Liberty such as were oppressed: But the Athenians did far exceed them in all Provisions, of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of Command among their Subjects, which they held, and afterward found of greater use in such need, than the willing readiness of Friends, who soon grow weary, and are not easily Assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

THE first and second years expedition was very grievous to the City of Athens. For the Fields were wasted; the Trees cut down; the Country People driven to flee, with their Wives, Children, and Cattel, into the Town; whereby a most furious Pestilence grew in the City, such as before they had neither felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Myrtenians, in the life of Leibos, and the Siege of Plataea their confederated City, which they durst not adventure to raise, besides some small overthrows received. The Lacedæmonians assembling as great Forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Country of Attica, and therein abide, until Victuals began to fail, waiting and destroying all things round about. The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the People to issue into the Field against them; for they knew the Valour of their Enemies; but used to send a Fleet into Peloponnesus, which waited as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemies, whilist they were making War in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Town of Plataea, which wanted refuge; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Myrtene, which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that War, the Lacedæmonians began to perceive how unfit they were to deal with such Enemies. For after that Attica was thoroughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to do any offence equal to such harm as they themselves might, and did receive. Their Confederates began to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiving well that Athens was plentifully relieved with all Necessaries, which came by Sea from the Islands that were subject unto that Estate; and therefore these Invaders took small pleasure in beholding the Walls of that mighty City, or in wasting a forsaken Field, which was to them a pattern of the Calamities, with which their own Territory was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began to set their care to build a strong Navy, wherein they had little good success, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better Ships; and were so skilful in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IV.

Of the great loss which the Spartans received at Pylus.

AMONG other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea, they received at Pylus a very fore loss, that compelled them to sue for Peace. A Fleet of Athenian Ships, bound for Coryra, waiting in that passage, as their manner was, the Coast of Laconia, Laconia, and all the half Isle of Peloponnesus, was by contrary Winds detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory, jutting to the Main, by a straight neck of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Island of less than two miles compass, for which a Creek, which is a good Harbour for Ships, the force of Weather being born off by the Head-Land and Isle. This Promontory the Athenians fortified, as well as in half they might; and what was wanting in their Artificial Fortification, was supplied by the natural strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of Ground and Haven, they reasonably expected many advantages against their Enemies. For the Country adjoining was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient time had held very strong and cruel War with Sparta; and, though quite subdued, they were held in straight subjection; yet was not the old hatred to extinguished, but by the near neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be revived. Furthermore, it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedæmonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repair to Pylus, and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not far off. Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this Haven, lying almost in the mid-way between them and Coryra, make them able to surround all Peloponnesus, and wait it at their pleasure. The News of these doings at Pylus, drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entered a few days before with their whole Army: But now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Navy, to recover this piece, which how bad a Neighbour it might prove in time, they well fore-knew, little fearing the grievous loss at hand, which they there in few days received. For when they in vain made a general Assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land, finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence; they occupied the Haven, placing four hundred and twenty choice men, all of them Citizens of Sparta, in the Island before mentioned; at each end whereof is a Channel, that leads into the Port, but so narrow, that only two Ships in front could enter between the Isle and Pylus; likewise but seven or eight Ships could enter at once by the further Channel, between the Island and the Main. Having thus taken order to shut up this new Town by Sea, they sent part of their Fleet to fetch Wood, and other stuff, wherewith to fortify round about, and block up the piece on all sides. But in the mean season, the Athenian Fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entering the Haven, did break and sink many of their Enemies Vessels; took five, and enforced the residue to run themselves a-ground.

Now was the Town secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Island as good as lost: Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the Camp (as was their custom in great dangers) to advise what were best for the Publick safety; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Isle, than by composition with their Enemies; they agreed to treat with the Athenians about Peace, taking Truce in the mean while with the Captains at Pylus. The Conditions of the Truce were, That the Lacedæmonians should deliver up all the Ships which were in the Coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Town, nor the Athenians against the Camp: That a certain quantity of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no Ships should pass into the Island secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedæmonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of Peace; and should bring them back, at whose return the Truce should end; which if in the mean time it were broken in any one point, the Truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian Ships, in as good case as they received them. The Embassadors coming to Athens, were in opinion, that as they themselves had begun the War, so might they end it when they pleased: Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedæmonians did sue to them for Peace; advising them to make an end of War, by which with such reputation they might. But they found all contrary to their expectation: For in stead of concluding upon even terms, or desiring of meet recompence for loss sustained, the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had been taken from them by the Lacedæmonians long before this War began; refusing likewise to continue the Treaty of Peace, unless the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendered unto them as Prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect, at which time the Truce being ended, it was desired of the Athenian Captains, that they should, according to their Covenant, restore the Ships, which had been put into their hands. Whereunto answer was made, that the condition of the Truce was, That if any one Article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) ye have assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are we acquainted of our promise to restore the Ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer shifts; yet profit for far over-weighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driven to use many hard means, for conveyance of Victuals into the Isle, which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried Prisoners to Athens; where it was decreed, that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these Prisoners should all be slain. Whether fearing the death of these men, or which-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell upon them, the Lacedæmonians were now so far from wasting Attica, that they suffered their own Country to be continually over-run, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their Coast, and by those who filled out of Pylus; which became the Rendezvous of all that were ill affected unto them.

§. V.

How the Lacedæmonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a Peace, that was not well kept.

THEREFORE they endeavoured greedily to obtain Peace; which the Athenians would not hearken unto. For they were so puffed up with the continuance of good success, that having sent a few bands of men into Sicily, to hold up a Faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilian Quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gain or loss; they banished the Captains, as if it had been merely through their default, that the Isle of Sicily was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it self; no whit inferior unto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their over-weening much abated shortly after, by some disaffers received, especially in Thrace, where in a Battel, which they lost at Ambipolis, Cleon, and Brajidas, Generals of the Athenian and Lacedaemonian Forces, were both slain; which two had most been Adversaries to the Peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedaemonians, who not only felt the like Wounds, but through the great Navy which they had received at Pylos, were fain to proceed lamely in the War, against such as, through commodity of their good Fleet, had all advantages that could be found in expedition, were fervently desirous to conclude the business, ere Fortune by any new favour should revive the enmity, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that urged them to bring the Treaty of Peace to good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their Heads, and ready to fall on them, which unless they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to avoid. The Estate of Argos, which had ancient enmity with them, was now, after a Truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by joining with those who alone found them work enough. Argos was a rich and strong City, which though inferior to Sparta in Valour, yet was not so unwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedaemonians could ever far prevail upon it, when they had little else to do. This was a thing that in the beginning of this War had not been regarded: For it was then thought that by waiving the Territory of Athens with Sword and Fire, the Quarrel should easily, and in short time have been ended; whereby not only the Athenians should have been brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake this War was undertaken, have been so firmly knit to the Lacedaemonians, that they should for love of them have abandoned the Argives to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, and means to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong Fleet, from any great harm: That the Peloponnesians, wanting wherewith to maintain a Navy, could do unto them; yea, as Masters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither War nor Peace; their daily Travels, and many Losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedaemonians were glad to use the occasion, when the inclination of their Enemies did then afford, of making a final Peace; which with much ado they procured, as seemed equal and easy; but were indeed impossible to be performed, and therefore all their travel was little effectual.

The restitution of Prisoners and places taken being agreed upon, it fell out by lot, that the Lacedæmonians should restore first. These had won more Towns upon the Continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had won, they had not won absolutely. For they had restored some Towns to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; some, and stole the most, they had let at Liberty (as reason required) which had opened their Gates unto them, as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to break in as Enemies. Now, concerning the Towns which were not in their own hands, but had been rendred unto their Confederates, the Spartans found means to give some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had gotten in

The War; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could perform. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to hear of being abandoned; neither would they by any means yield themselves into the hands of their old Lords, the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithstanding whatsoever Articles were drawn, and concluded, for their security, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of Conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that retorting only the Prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, until such time as they might receive the full satisfaction according to the Agreement. But before such time as these difficulties broke out into matter of open Quarrel, the Lacedæmonians entered into a more straight Alliance with the Athenians; making a League Offensive and Defensive with them. Hereunto they were moved by the backwardness of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to have fled for Peace at their hands, as soon as things were once compounded between Athens and Sparta, did shew themselves plainly unwilling to give ear to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make sure work; the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound unto them by well-deferving in the late War, or found so troublesome, that their Enmity (if perhaps they durst let it appear) were little more than Friendship. It bred great jealousy in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive such a conjunction between two so powerful Signories; especially one claime threatening every one, that was any thing apt to fear, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Country, and taking away what they could lay hold on. For besides the other Articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual consent add new Conditions, or alter the old at their own pleasures. This imprefion wrought so frongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had born to the Athenians their professed Enemies, was violently thrown upon the Lacedæmonians their unjust Friends; whereby it came to pass, that they who had lately born chief sway in Greece, might have been abandoned to the discretion of their Enemies, as already in effect they were, had the Enemies wisely used the advantage.

§. VI.

Of the Negotiations, and Practices, held between many States of Greece, by occasion of the Peace that was concluded.

THE admiration wherein all Greece held the Valour of Sparta as unrefutable, and able to make way through all impediments, had been too excessive, that when by some sinister accidents that City was compelled to take and seek Peace, upon terms not founding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens usually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was never thought that any Lacedaemonian would have endured to lay down his Weapons, and yield himself Prisoner; nor that any misfortune could have been so great, as should have drawn that City to relieve it self otherwise than by force of Arms. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens among whom

5. VIII

whom were some of the Caribbees before Pylus, had rather by Enemies, in the Island before Pylus, had rather chosen to live in Captivity, than to die in Fight; and that Pylus it self, being sick as a Thorn in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that of Elfate, as utterly wearying the accustomed Spanish remolition, had made it lie down, and seek to refresh it self by dishonourable ease: Then did not only the Comibians and Tubamas begin to conceive bafely of those men which were virtuous, though unfortunate; but other lesser Cities joyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their Eyes upon the rich and great City of Arger, of whose ability, to do much, they conceived a strong belief, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish error is become almost natural in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should have discerned only the virtues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting to our selves.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta, were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moved rather by envy at the greatness of Athen's daily increasing) the Lacedæmonians had entered into the present War. But these Corinthians did only murmur at the Peace, alledging as grievances, that some Towns of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of War, had procured some part of the Archadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependency upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discover themselves; fearful of revenge to come working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argives, feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their sails, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand under; giving for that purpose unto twelve of their Citizens, a full and absolute Commission to make Alliance between them and any free Cities of Greece (Athen and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular business to the multitude. When the Gates of Argos were thus for open to all comers; the Mantineans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them, entered into this new Confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wisest way to do as the most did. What inconvenience might arise to them by their close confederence with the Lacedæmonians easily discerned; and therefore the present Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had been hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a gravity expressing the opinion which they had conceived of their present advantage over Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entered yet into the Alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gave Audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whose Embassage was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their Oath, could not forsake the Alliance, and that they had long since made with themselves reason did as well bind them to hold themselves contented with the Peace lately made; as Religion enforced them to continue in their ancient Confederacy; forasmuch as it had been agreed between the Spartans and their Associates, that the confederacy of the greater part, (which had yielded up Peace with Athen) should bind the lesser number to perform what was concluded, if no Divisions impediment withstood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the War wherein they had lost many places, without provision of refection; and that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquit them from any necessity of subsidizing to the late Peace; forasmuch as they had sworn unto those People whom they perswaded to rebel against Athens, that they would never abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall again into the Tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in Reason and Religion, to use all means of upholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an Oath was then were Psefidence, Tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things undertaken. As for the Alliance with Argos, they said, that they would do as they should find cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors with this Answer, they made all haste to join themselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also upon the point to have entered into this new Confederacy. But as the affections were divers, which caused this hasty conclusion of sudden Friends to Argos, it so likewise came to pass, that the friendship it self, such as it was, had much diversity both of sincerity and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians; as the Mantineans and Eleans: where did firmly break themselves to the Argives, in whom they knew the same affection to be inveterate; others did only hate the Spartans; and these would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argives in War, yet rather the Argives in War than the Lacedæmonians, who were the Peace: Of this number were the Corinthians, who knew that the Thebans were affected like unto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the Society of the Argives, as they had done: but the different forms of Government, used in Sparta and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather the Spartans than that was ruled by the principal men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joining with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This business having ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to bethink themselves of their own danger, who had not so much as any Truce with Athenians; and yet were unprepared for War. They thought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians; and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one Ciry, that shewed against them more from than force; but gave them to understand, that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claim the benefit of their Alliance, which Athen had lately made, with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally, they granted unto these Corinthians (which were loath to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) that Truce that they desired; but into private confederacy they would not admit them, it being an Article of the League between them and the Spartans. That the one should not make Peace nor War without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearly be seen the great advantage which absolute Liberty have as well in Peace as in War, over such as are served by voluntaries. We shall hardly find a single Signory, that hath been so constantly follow-as Sparta was, by so many States, and some of their little inferior to it self, being all as free: Whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsive means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants. But in performance of Conditions agreed upon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacy, and giving up such places as were agreed upon: of which the Lacedæmonians could do neither the one nor the other. For such Towns as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Town of Panactæ, which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof unto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recover Pylus) unless they would agree to make a private Alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were fain to do, though knowing it to be contrary to the last Agreement between them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians having broken one Article of the League made between them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give up the Town of Panactæ, till first they had utterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was fought to have been excused by the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, who coming to Athens (whither they had sent home all Prisoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoped with gentle words to fawn the matter; saying, That from henceforth no Enemy to Athens should nestle in Panactæ, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deal with tame Fools: For the Athenians told them in plain terms, That of three principal Conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but used such base collusion as stood not with their Honour; having made private Alliance with the Thebans, having destroyed a Town that they should have restored; and not having forced their dependants by War, to make good the Covenants of the late concluded Peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the Peace; among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that year, in Sparta; and Alcibiades, a powerful young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the War, yet withstood that they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendered to them by Covenant, especially Pylus, that had so lately troubled them. Alcibiades, who Nobility, Riches, and Favour with the People, made him desire War, as the means, whereby himself might procure some Honourable Employment, used all means to set the Quarrel on foot, whilst the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendered ought to their Prisoners, and presence enough to use that advantage of breaking the Peace, by reason that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all Covenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to perform nothing that the Lacedæmonians should, and might require, until they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all Articles whereunto they were bound, even to the utmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who having already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens which were Prisoners. But Alcibiades withstanding a speedy beginning of open War, sent privately to the Argives, and gave them to understand how fully the time served for them to associate themselves with Athens, which was enough to give them security against all Enemies.

The Argives upon the first Confluence of many Effates unto their Society, had embraced great hopes of working Wonders, as if they should have had the Conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that Honour, as having ill used it, and thereby leaving their old Enemies in case of much contempt and disability. But these sudden apprehensions of vain Joy, were suddenly changed into as vain Fear; which ill agreed with the great Opinion that had lately been conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their Alliance; when the Corinthians had sought Security from Athens; and when a false Rumour was noised abroad, that Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full Agreement upon all Points of difference; then began the Argives to let fall their Creeds, and sue for Peace unto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their Gravity, and were not over hasty to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the Message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were not now consulting how to become the Chief of all others, but how to save themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their own Embassadors accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a League offensive and defensive, between their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this business the Lacedæmonians knew not what to think: for well they saw, that such a Combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to prevent it; but to keep the Love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done than stood with their Honour or Profit; others held it the wisest way, having done so much, not to stick upon a little more, but rather, by giving full satisfaction to retain the Friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than all the rest of Greece. This Resolution prevailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the Peace, who coming to Athens with full Commission to make an end of all Controversies, did earnestly labour in the Council-House, to make the truth of things appear; saying, that their Confederacy with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the Recovery of Panactæ: concerning which Town, or any other business, that it much grieved the Lacedæmonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might give to the Athenians cause of dish pleasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters even between them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute Commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored unto them, and especially for the present, that the Negotiation with the Argives might be called aside. Favourable Audience was given to this Proposition, the rather, because they which promised a mends, had power to make their words good. But all this fair likelihood of good Agreement was dashed on the sudden, by the practice of Alcibiades, who secretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, persuaded them well of his Friendship towards their City, and advised them to take all care that their absolute Power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be known to the Commonalty of Athens, lest the infoinsolent Multitude should thereupon grow pre-emptory, and yield to nothing, unless they could draw them to unreasonable Conditions. The Embassadors believed him, and fashioned their Tale in the Assembly of the People as he had advised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the advantage, which their double dealing afforded, inveighed openly against them, as men of no sincerity, that were come to Athens for none other purpose, than to hinder the People from strengthening themselves with Friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their own Alliance, as (contrary to their Oath) already they had the Thebans. The People of Athens, whom a pleasing Errand would hardly have satisfied, or brought into a good Opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whose honest Meanings had so ill been seconded with good performance) were now so incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong persuasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the League with Argos. Yet for the present, so far did Nicias, an Honorable Citizen, and great Friend to the Peace, prevail with them, that the Business was put off, till he himself with other Embassadors might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may seem a great Wonder, how so poor a Trick of Alcibiades was able to carry a matter of such importance, when the Spartan Embassadors might have cast the Load upon his own shoulders, by discovering the truth. But the Gravity which was usually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindered them (perhaps) from playing their Game handsomely against so nimble a Wit; and they might well have been thought untruthful men, had they professed themselves such as would say and unfay for their most advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a fower Message to deliver at Sparta, being pre-emptorily to require performance of all Conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the pains to rebuild Panactæ, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them understand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into Confederacy with the Argives and their Adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no mind to forsake the Thebans, assured Friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the Anger of the Athenians was suffered to break out what way it could, which to mitigate they would do no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable Friend, who would not seem to have effected nothing) swear anew to keep the Articles of the League between them and Athens. Immediately therefore upon return of the Embassadors, a new League was made between the Athenians, Argives, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample provision for holding the same common Friends and Enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed over with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this Confederacy did bend it self chiefly against them, as in short while after was proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could unto the Athenians, and procured others to do the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their own (Prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the loss of Reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late War by misfortune, than in sundry Passages between them and the Athenians: to procure and keep whole Amity, they had left sundry of their old Friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise, the Athenians, by the Treaty of Peace, had recovered the most of that which they lost in War; all their Gettings they had retained, and were strengthened by the access of new Confederates.

How the Peace between Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their Fellows had found Business wherewith to set the Athenians on work, and make use of this Conjunction. For presuming upon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So many acts of hostility were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did not (as Principals) inflict each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their several Friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Boeotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other People of Greece, began anew to range themselves under the Lacedæmonians; and follow their Ensigns. One Victory which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meer Valour in a set Battle near to Mantineæ, against the Argive side, helped well to repair their decayed Reputation, though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The civil dissention arising shortly after within Argos it self, between the principal Citizens and the Commons, had almost thrown down the whole frame of the new Combination. For the chief Citizens getting the upper hand, made a League with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so far as to renounce the Amity of the Athenians in express words, and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short space of time the Multitude prevailing, reversed all this, and having chased away their ambitious Nobility, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Besides these Upstarts in Peloponnesus, many Affairs were made to raise up Troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedonia, to the Athenians; whose Forces and readiness for Execution prevented some things, revenged other, and required all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter for quarrel, and the Lacedæmonians growing weary, they began to be quiet, retaining still that Enmity in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not as yet breaking out into terms of open War.

S. VIII.

The Athenians sending two Fleets to sack Siracuse, are put to flight and utterly discomfited.

DURING this intermission of open War the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of subduing Sicily, whether they sent a Fleet so mighty as never was yet forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all Necessaries to so great an Expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the Factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that Voyage, and one of the Generals of their Fleet, was driven to banish himself, for fear of such Judgment, as else he was like to have undergone among the incensed People; partly by the Invasion which the Lacedæmonians made upon Attica.

whilst the Forces of that State were so far from home. Hereinto was added the Aid of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with Money.

Neither was the success of things in Sicily such, as without help from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end in that War. For although in the beginning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they Besieged Syracuse, the chief City of the Island, and one of the fairest Towns which the Greeks Inhabited, obtaining the better in sundry Battels by Land and Sea; yet when the Town was relieved with strong Aid from Peloponnesians, it came to pass that the Athenians were put to the worse on all sides, in such wise, that their Fleet was shut up into the Haven of Syracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian Affairs went very ill in Sicily, so did they at home stand upon hard terms, for that the Lacedaemonians, who had been formerly accustomed to make wearisome yearly Journeys into Attica, which having pillaged and foraged, they returned home; did now by Counsel of Alcibiades, (who seeking Revenge upon his own Citizens, was fled unto them) fortify the Town of Decelea, which was near to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harry all the Country round about, and sometimes give Alarm unto the City itself.

In these extremities, the perverse obstinacy of the Athenians was very strange; who leaving at their backs, and at their own doors, an Enemy little less mighty than themselves, did yet fend forth another Fleet into Sicily, to invade a People no less puissant, which never had offended them.

It often happens that prosperous events make foolish Counsel seem wiser than it was, which came to pass many times among the Athenians, whose vain conceits Pallas was fain to turn unto the best. But where unfound advice, finding bad proof, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserable issue. This second Fleet of the Athenians, which better might have served to convey home the former, that was defeated; after some attempts made to small purpose against the Syracusians, was finally (together with the other part of the Navy, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bar'd up into the Haven of Syracuse, whereby the Camp of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driven to break up and flee away by Land; in which flight they were over-taken, routed, and quite overthrown in such wise, that scarce any man escaped.

This mischief well deservedly fell upon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into Exile, Sophocles and Phidias, Generals, formerly sent into that Isle, pretending that they had taken money for making Peace in Sicily; whereas indeed there was not any means or possibility to have made War. Hereby it came to pass, that Nicias, who had the chief Command in this unhappy enterprise, did rather choose to hazard the ruin of his Country, by the loss of that Army, wherein consisted little less than all the power of Athens, than to adventure his own Estate, his Life, and his Honour, upon the Tongues of shameless accusers, and the sentence of Judges before his Tryal resolved to condemn him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdom and necessity required it. For (said he) they shall give sentence upon us, who know not the reason of our doings, nor will give ear to any that would speak in our behalf; but altogether hearken to suspicious and vain rumours that shall be brought against us; yea, these our Soldiers, who now are so deferred to return in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the loud and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an Honest and Valiant man, to do what Reason willeth, not what Opinion expecteth; and to measure Honour or Dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed Confidence, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the injustice of his People; and had well understood that a wicked Sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked Fact, as being held a precedent and pattern, whereby Oppression beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable upon all. Therefore his fear of wrongful condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily have over-mastered; but when afterwards the Army, having no other expectation of safety than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moon, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to have the Camp break up till seven and twenty days were past. His timorousness was even as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the power of the Heavens, and the course of Nature would be as unjust as his Athenians; or might pretend less evil to the foolish, than to such as did their best. Neither do I think that any Astrologer can alledge this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armes destruction, otherwise than as the folly of men did, by application, turn it to their own confusion. Had C. Calfius, the Roman, he, who slew Julius Caesar, imitated this Superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retiring, the broken remainder of Calfius his Army defeated by the Partisan Archers, was advised, upon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sun were past the Sign of Scorpio; he made answer, that he stood not in such fear of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heavens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon Earth, he made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both shew his noble resolution, and give a fair example to that good rule.

— Sapiens dominatum astris.

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily works by condescension of means, deprives the Governours of understanding, when he intends evil to the multitude; and that the wickedness of unjust men is the ready mean to weaken the virtue of those who might have done them good.

Of the troubles wherewith the State of Athens fell, after the great loss of the Fleet and Army in Sicily.

THE loss of this Army was the ruin of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accompanied a very little less calamity to that Estate, than was the subversion of the Walls, when the City about seven years after was taken by Lysander. For now began the Subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebel; of whom, some they reduced under their Obedience, others held out; some for fear of greater inconvenience were set at Liberty, promising only to be their good Friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others having a kind of liberty offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect liberty by force. Among these troubles it fell out very unseasonably, that the principal men of Athens being wearied with the Peoples indolency, took upon them to change the form of that Estate, and bring the Government into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captains which were abroad, they caused them to set up the form of an Aristocracy in the Towns of their Confederates; and in the mean time, some that were most likely to withstand this innovation, being slain at Athens, the Commonalty were so dismay'd that none durst speak against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not; but every man was afraid of his Neighbour, lest he should be a member of the League. In this general fear the Majesty of Athens was usurped by four hundred men, who observing in shew the ancient form of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded unto the People, and concluded upon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were only such as were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had the Commonalty any other liberty, than only to approve and give consent, for whatsoever presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no enquiry made of the Murder. By these means were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authority, which nevertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Army, which then was at the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the four hundred usurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of Banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised unto the Lacedaemonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made unprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first been very well entertained in Sparta, whilst his Service done to that State was not grown to be the object of envy. But when it appeared that in Counsel and good performance he so far excelled all the Lacedaemonians, that all their good success was ascribed to his Wit and Valour, then were all the principal Citizens weary of his virtue; especially Agis, one of their Kings, whose Wife had so far yielded her self to the love of this Athenian, that among her inward Friends she could not forbear to call her young Child by his Name. Hereupon order was taken that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the Spartan Treachery, conveyed himself unto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great Beauty, sweet Conversation, and found Wit, that he soon became the Master of that Barbarous Vice-roy's affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and Forces in those parts. Then began he to advise Tissaphernes, not so far forth to assist the Lacedaemonians, that they should quite overthrow the State of Athens, but rather to help the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsel he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his Reputation (as the only Favourite of so great a Potentate) he plaid his own Game, procuring his restitution. At length his Banishment being repealed by the Army, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the four hundred) he laboured greatly to reconcile the Soldiers to the Governours; or at least to divert their heat another way, and turn it upon the common Enemy. Some of the four hundred approved his motion, as being weary of the Tyranny whereof they were partakers; partly because they saw it could not long endure, and partly for that themselves, being less regarded by the rest of their companions, than flood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtain Peace of the Lacedaemonians, desiring chiefly to maintain both their own Authority, and the greatness of their City, if they might; but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserve their own power, or safety at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundry overtures of Peace to the Lacedaemonians, desiring to compound in as good terms as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the wavering multitude; especially considering that the City of Sparta was Governed by an Aristocracy, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the four hundred (or the most and chief of them) and the Lacedaemonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the City of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repair their losses, was not inclined to make composition; from which upon juster ground the Enemy was much more averse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not unknown abroad) might yield some fair opportunity to the destruction of it self, which in effect (and though not then presently) came to pass. And upon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his Forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he received some small losses. Likewise the Navy of Peloponnesians made shew of attempting the City, but seeing no likelihood of success, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained Victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have been regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seems, without any disparagement to their Wisdom, they should rather have forborn to present unto the City, or to the Countries near adjoining any terror of the War. For the diffidence within the Walls might soon have done more hurt than could be received from the Fleet or Army without; which indeed gave occasion to fit the Citizens at unity, though it lasted not very long. The four hundred, by means of these troubles, were fain to resign their Authority, which they could not now hold, when the People having taken Arms to repel Foreign Enemies, would not lay them down, till they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of Government a full restitution of the Sovereign Command unto the People, or whole Body of this City, but only to five thousand; which Company the four hundred (when their Authority began) had pretended to take unto them as Assistants: herein seeming to do little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who seldom assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions should be recalled from Exile; and that the Army at Samos should be requested to undertake the Government; which was forthwith reformed according to the Soldiers desire.

§. X.

How Alcibiades won many important Victories for the Athenians, was recalled from Exile, made their General, and again deposed.

THIS establishment of things in the City, was accompanied with some good success in the Wars.

Wars. For the Lacedæmonians were about the same time overthrowen at Sea, in a great Batel, by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos; to which Alcibiades afterwards joining such Forces as he could raise, obtained many Victories. Before the Town of Abydos, his arrival with eighteen Ships gave the Honour of a great Batel to the Athenians; he overthrowed and utterly destroyed the Fleet of the Lacedæmonians, commanded by Mindarus, took the Towns of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrian ransom their City, and fortified Chrysopolis. Hereupon Letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to contain the distress of the Army in these few words: All is lost, Mindarus is slain, the Souldiers want Victuals, we know not what to do.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades overthrowed the Lacedæmonians in Fight by Land at Chaledon, took Selymbria, besieged and won Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which even in those days was a goodly, rich, and very strong City. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made High Admiral of all the Navy.

But this his Honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and he driven to Banish himself again; only because his Lieutenant, contrary to the express command of Alcibiades, fighting with the Enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the Fleet.

The second Banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmful than the first; and the loss which thereupon they received, was (though more heavy to them, yet) less to be pitied of others, than that which ensued upon his former Exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought revenge upon his own City; now, as 'inured to Adversity, he rather pitied their fury, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should have repaired their weak Estate, than fought by procuring or beholding the calamity of his People, to comfort himself after injury received. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the Fleet, he presented Batel to Lysander, the Lacedæmonian Admiral, who was not so confident upon his former Victory, as to undertake Alcibiades himself, bringing Ships more in number (notwithstanding the former loss of fifteen) than his Enemies had, and better ordered than they had been under his Lieutenant. But when the Decree of the People was published in the Navy, then did Alcibiades withdraw himself to a Town upon Hellepont, called Bizantie, where he had built a Castle.

§. XI.

The Batel at Arginusæ, and Condemnation of the Victorious Athenian Captains by the People.

AFTER this time the Athenians, receiving many losses and discomfures, were driven to fly into the Haven of Mystene, where they were straitly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this Siege necessity enforced them to Man all their Vessels, and to put the uttermost of their Forces into the hazard of one Batel. This Batel was fought at Arginusæ, where Callistratus, Admiral of the Lacedæmonians, losing the honour of the day, preserved his own Reputation by dying valiantly in the Fight. It might well have been expected, that the ten Captains, who joyntly had Command in chief over the Athenian Fleet, should for that good days Service, and so happy a Victory, have received great Honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forthwith called home, and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose Ships were broken and sunk, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them up, they might have saved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captains readily made a very just answer; That they, pursuing the Victory, had left part of the Fleet, under sufficient men, to save those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a Tempest arising about the end of the Fight, had hindered the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse availed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himself escaping in a Mealtub, had been intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the People revenge of their deaths upon the Captains. It was very strange, that upon such an accusation, maintained with so slender Evidence, men that had well deserved of their Country, should be overthrowed. But their Enemies had to incense the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolve them, save only Socrates the wife and virtuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgment was not regarded. Six of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much ado relieved by other Vessels in the Storm: but the Captains which were absent escaped; for when the fury of the People was over-past, this judgment was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceived and perverted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamy of injustice; but the Divine Justice was not asleep, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

The Batel at Ægos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian War.

THE Peloponnesian Fleet under Lysander, the year next following, having scoured the Ægean Seas, entered Hellepont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged and took the Town of Lampascus. Hereupon all the Navy of Athens, being an hundred and fourscore Sail, made thither in haste; but finding Lampascus taken before their coming, they put in at Sifos, where having refreshed themselves, they sailed to the River, called Ægos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goat-brake, or the River of the Goats; being on the Continent, opposite to Lampascus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole League off from Lysander, who rode at Lampascus in the Harbour. The next day after their arrival they presented fight unto the Peloponnesians, who refused it; whereupon the Athenians returned again to Ægos-Potamos; and thus they continued five days, braving every day the Enemy, and returning to their own Harbour when it drew towards Evening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not far from the Navy, and his power in those places was such as might have greatly availed his Country-men, if they could have made use of it. For he had waded Mercenaries, and making War in his own Name upon some People of the Thracians, had gathered much Wealth, and obtained much Reputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired unto them, and shewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not soon fore-see and prevent it. For they lay in a Road subject to every

Weather,

Weather, neither near enough to any Town where they might furnish themselves with necessities; nor so far off as had been more expedient. Seftos was the next Market-Town; thither both Souldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Navy every day, as soon as they were returned from braving the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Seftos, which was not far off; or at the least, to consider better how near their Enemy was, whose fear proceeded rather from obedience to his General, than from any cowardice. This admonition was so far despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his own matters, and to remember that his Authority was out of date. Had it not been for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedæmonians either to fight upon unequal terms, or utterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might have done, by transporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his followers, over the Straights, who assaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leave their Ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good Counsel no better than hath been rehearsed, he left them to their fortune, which how evil it would be he did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himself by the advantage of his Haven, was not careless in looking into the demeanor of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who observing their doings, related unto him what they had seen. Therefore understanding in what careless fashion they romed up and down the Country, he kept all his men aboard after their departure, and the fifth day gave especial charge to his Scouts, That when they perceived the Athenians disembarking, as their custom was, and walking towards Seftos, they should forthwith return, and hang up a brazen Shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readiness, made all speed that strength of Oars could give, to Ægos-Potamos, where he found very few of his Enemies aboard their Ships, not many near them, and all in great confusion upon the news of his approach.

Inasmuch that the greatest industry which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine Ships, which knowing how much that loss imported, gave over Athens as desperate, and made a long flight unto the Isle of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pieces. This was the War, which had lasted seven and twenty years, with variable success, concluded in one hour; and the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that the never after shone again in her perfect light.

Immediately upon this Victory, Lysander, having taken in such Towns as readily did yield up on the first flame of his exploit, set sail for Athens, and joining his Forces with those of Agis and Pausanias, Kings of Sparta, Summoned the City, which finding too stubborn to yield, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth again to Sea; and rather by terror than violence, compelling all the Islands, and such Towns of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, he did thereby cut off all provision of Victuals, and other Necessaries, from the City, and enforced the People by meer Famine to yield to these Conditions. That the long Walls leading from the Town to the Port, should be thrown down; That all Cities subject to their Estate, should be free at liberty; That the Athenians should be Masters only of their own Territories, and the Fields adjoining to their Town; And that they should keep no more than twelve Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the Wars.

These Articles being agreed upon, the Walls were thrown down with great joycing of those who had born displeasure to Athens; and not without some consultation of destroying the City, and laying waste the Land about it. Which Advice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Governours, or rather cruel Tyrants, appointed over the People, who recompensed their former infidelity and injustice over their Captains, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable Slavery.

The only small hope remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repair what their own folly had ruined. But the thirty Tyrants perceiving this, advertised the Lacedæmonians thereof, who contrived, and (as now dominating in every quarter) soon effected his sudden Death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian War. After which, the Lacedæmonians abusing the Reputation, and great Power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to all Greece; and by Combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their High Authority, even in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foil that they took was of the Thebans, led by Epaminondas, under whom Philip of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his Education. By these Thebans, the City of Sparta (besides other great losses received) was sundry times in danger of being taken. But these haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the several Estates and Signories of Greece were grown so jealous one of another's greatness, that the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Argives, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker party, did to counterpoise the stronger, that no one City could extend the limits of her Jurisdiction so far as might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Country remained rather evenly balanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had been dependants, and followers, yea, almost meer Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found means, by making use of their Factions, to bring them all into Servitude, from which they never could be free, till the Romans presenting them with a show of Liberty, did themselves indeed become their Masters.

because Critias, and one other of the thirty, perished in that Fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Pisanes, together with some exhortations used by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirty were depofed. Nevertheless there were fo many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the thirty in their mifdeeds, feared to be called to a sharp account, that no peace, nor quiet form of Government could be eftablifhed. For Embaffadors were fent to Sparta, who craving aid againft Thrasybulus, and his followers, had favourable Audience, and a Power fent to their affiftance, both by Land and Sea, under the conduct of Lysander, and his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Army of the Cities Confederate with the Lacedaemonians. And here appeared first the jealoufy, wherein some People held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians and Corinthians, who in the late Wars had been the moft bitter Enemies to Athen, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleging that it stood not with their Oaths, to make War againft that People, who had not hitherto broken any one Article of the League:

CHAP. X.

§. I.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt againft his Brother.

THE matters of Greece now standing upon such terms that no one Estate durst oppose it self against that of Lacedaemon; young Cyrus, Brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, having in his Fathers life time very carefully prosecuted the War against Athen, did fend his Messengers to Sparta, requesting that their love might appear no less to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous War against the Athenians. To this request, being general, the Lacedaemonians gave a suitable answer, commanding their Admiral to perform unto Cyrus all Service that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himself, and the Lacedaemonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdom of Persia should have been the recompence of his services; or that he perishing in Battel, as after he did, the subversion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew unto the Greeks the ways, which under the Macedonian Ensigns, the Victorious footsteps of their Posterity should measure; and opening unto them the Riches, and with all the Weakness of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that Conquest, which he referred to another Generation; than to give into their hands that mighty Kingdom, whole hour was not yet come. The love which Paryfatus the Queen-Mother of Persia bare unto Cyrus her younger Son, being seconded by the earnest favour of the People, and ready desires of many principal men, had moved this young Prince, in his Fathers Old Age to aspire after the Succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before been shewed) whose but fearing, indeed, lest the Lacedaemonians should annex the Territory of Athen to their own Domains. It is not to be doubted that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to cross the proceedings of Lysander, whom he envied. Therefore having in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasybulus his party, made a shew of War, he finally wrought such means, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirty men, and such others, as were like to give cause of Tumult, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that Tyrannical Faction, having withdrawn themselves to Eleufine, were shortly after found to attempt some innovation; whereupon the whole City rising against them, took their Captains, as they were coming to Parly, and slew them: which done, to avoid further inconvenience, a Law was made, that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which Order, wisely made, and carefully observed, the City returned to her former quietness.

meaning was to curb this ambitious Youth; he found his elder Brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings favour, that it were not safe to attempt any means of displacing him, by whose disfavour himself might easily lose the place of a Vice-roy, which he held in Asia the less, and hardly be able to maintain his own life. The nearest Neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tifaphernes, a man compounded of Cowardice, Treachery, Craft, and all Vices which customably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, using by the way all fair shews of Friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought that Queen Paryfatus had obtained the Inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true that Paryfatus had used the best of her endeavour to that purpose, alleging that (which in former Ages had been much available to Xerxes, in the like difcipation with his elder Brother) Artaxerxes was born whilst his Father was a private Man, but Cyrus, when he was a Crowned King. All which not fufficing; when the moft that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoining; then did this Tifaphernes discover his Nature, and accuse his Friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous Treason intended against his Person. Upon this Accufation, whether true or false, very easily believed, Cyrus was Arrested, and by the most vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly delivered, and sent back into his own Province.

§. II.

§. II.

The Preparations of Cyrus, and his first entry into the War.

THE form of Government which the Persian Lieutenants used in their several Provinces, was in many points almost Regal. For they made War and Peace, as they thought it meet, not only for the Kings behoof, but for their own Reputation; usually indeed with the Kings Enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their own Heads were held only at the Kings pleasure; which caused them to frame all their doings, to his will, whatsoever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himself, the Interest that he had in the Kingdom, the small assurance of his Brothers Love, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late Imprisonment, and the means which he had by love of his own People, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedaemonians, whom he had bound unto him, to obtain the Crown for himself. Neither was it occasion should present it self; but rather enterprise some what whilst yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first began to quarrel with Tifaphernes, and seized upon many Towns of his Jurisdiction, annexing them to his own Province; which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simply) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomable Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his Brothers hot spirit exercised in private Quarrels. But Tifaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, and cowardly despised, although he durst not adventure to take Arms against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milefians were about to give up themselves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other Towns of the Ionians had done, thought by terror to preserve his Reputation, and keep the Town in his own hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing fair occasion to take Arms, which was no small part of his desire. In levying Souldiers he used great Policy; for he took not only the men of his own Province, or of the Countries adjoining, whose lives were ready at his will; but secretly he furnished some Græcians Captains with Money, who being very good men of War, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessaly, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to cross the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their several Wars, that the Souldiers might be held in continual exercise, and ready in Arms upon the sudden. Cyrus having sent a power of men to Besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greeks, who very readily came over to his assistance, being three hundred thousand very firm Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Army, and that which he levied before, he could very easily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tifaphernes out of Asia the less: but his purpose was not to so late time in small matters, that was to be employed in the accomplishment of higher designs. Preparing therefore that the Persians, a People of Asia the less, not Subject to the Persian, had invaded his Territory, he raised the Siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leaving Tifaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to rejoice that Cyrus had left him to himself, when he considered that to great an Army, and so strong, was never levied against the Rovers of Persia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred Horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus took his Journey into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

THE Tumult which his coming brought was the great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira, against Paryfatus, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasion of the War. But whilst the King in great fear was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger hastened upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his numbers much increased, by the repair of his Country-men, though most strengthened by the access of seven hundred Greeks, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by trial in a Muster, which (to please the Queen of Cilicia, who had brought him Aid) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Army, which contained an hundred thousand men; the whole Camp (not perceiving that this was but a bravery) fled amain, the Victuallers and Baggage forsaking their Cabins, and running all away for very fear. This was to Cyrus a joyful spectacle, who knew very well, that his Brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more unlikely to make resistance, because they were professed to the War against their will and dispositions; whereas his Army was drawn along by meer affection and good will. Nevertheless he found it a very hard matter to persuade the Greeks to pass the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had trodden, wearied them with conceit of the tedious return. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cilicia, to seek excuses, telling them, that Abrocarnus, one of the Kings principal Captains, and his own great Enemy, lay by the River, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such devices, and excessive promise of Reward, he brought them to the Euphrates, where some of the Greeks considering, that who so passed the River first, should have the most thanks, and might fairly return if the rest should refuse to follow them, they entered the Floods, whereby were all finally persuaded to do as some had begun; and being allured by great hopes, they resolved to seek out Artaxerxes, whereforever he was to be found. The King in the mean time having raised an Army of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident upon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in trial of a plain Battel. Abrocarnus, who with three hundred thousand men had undertaken to make good the Straights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong Wall, and other defences of Nature and Art, which made the place to seem impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himself towards the King Forces, not daring to look Cyrus in the face, who despairing to find any way by Land, had procured the Lacedaemonian Fleet, by the benefit whereof to have transported his Army. I do not find that this Cowardice of Artaxerxes, or of his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Camp till five days were past after the Battel, received either punishment or disgrace; for they, toward whom he withdrew himself, were all made of the same metal.

Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the uttermost bounds of his Kingdom, until by Teribazus, one of his Captains, he was persuaded not to abandon so many goodly Provinces to the Enemy, who would thereby have gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharp disposition of Tide to a Kingdom is most available) would have grown superior in Reputation. By such advice the King relied upon meeting with his Brother, who now began to be secure, being fully persuaded that Artaxerxes would never dare to abide him in the Field. For the King having cast up a Trench of almost forty miles in length, about thirty foot broad, and eighteen foot deep, intended there to have encamped; but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe as to be far distant from his Enemies.

§. IV.

The Battel between Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THE Army of Cyrus having overcome many difficulties of civil ways, and scarcity of Victuals, was much encouraged by perceiving this great fear of Artaxerxes; and being past this Trench, marched carelessly in great disorder, having bestowed their Arms in Carts, and upon Beasts of carriage; when on the sudden one of their Vancourers brought news of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, and had ranged their Battels in good order upon the side of the River Euphrates, where they waited for the coming of their Enemies, whom they saw not till it was after noon. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their near approach how well they were marshalled, coming on very orderly, in silence; whereas it had been expected, that rushing violently with loud clamours, they should have spent all their force upon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so unequal in distance, being all embattelled in one body and figure, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the midst of his own, did not with the corner and utmost point thereof, reach to the half breadth of Artaxerxes his Battel, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus. Then did the Greeks begin to distrust their own Manhood, which was not accustomed to make proof of it self, upon such excessive odds. It was almost incredible, that so great an Army should be so easily chafed. Nevertheless, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, having learned (contrary to their custom) to give charge upon their Enemies with silence, had not learned (for it was contrary to their Nature) to receive a strong charge with courage. Upon the very first offer of onsets, made by the Greeks, all that basely ruble of Cowards (as I said) again, without abating the flock, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with Hooks and Scythes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did snail hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping down, did away on foot. This base demeanor of his Enemies gave so much confidence to Cyrus, and his followers, that such as were about him forthwith adored him as King. And certainly, the Tide had been assured unto him that day, had not he sought how to declare himself worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the Field which lay before him void, was about to encompass the Greeks, and to set upon them in the rear, he advanced with six hundred Horse, and gave so valiant a charge upon a Squadron of six thousand which lay before the King, that he brake it, slaying the Captain thereof, Artageres, with his own hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole company of six hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chase, leaving Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiving where the King stood in troop, uncertain whether to fight, or leave the Field, could not contain himself, but said, I see the man; and presently with a small handful of men about him ran upon his Brother, whom he strake through the Curls, and wounded in the Breast. Having given this stroke, which was his last, he received immediately the fatal blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the Eye with a Dart, thrown by a brave Fellow; whereupon astonished, he fell dead from his Horse, or so hurt, that it was impossible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safety; not caring afterwards for their own lives, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Master was slain. Artaxerxes caused the Head and right Hand of his Brother to be forthwith broken off, and shewed to his People, who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling upon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings Troops, and utterly dismayed such Persian Captains, as were now, even in their own Eyes, no better than Rebels; it was not long ere the Camp of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned; from whence Artaxerxes, making all speed, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greeks, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tisaphernes, who having made way through the Battel of the Greeks, was ready now to join with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the news, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his Brothers death, been sufficient to countervail all disasters received, the exploit of Tisaphernes in breaking through the Greeks would have yielded little comfort. For Tisaphernes had not slain any one man of the Greeks, but contrariwise, when he gave upon them, they opening their Battel, drove him with great slaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the Squadron of the Greeks. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greeks, as Masters of the Field, gave chase to all that came in their fight; they ranged their Companies into good order; and followed after these Greeks, intending to set upon them in Rear. But these good Souldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to lack Honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued unto a certain Village, that lay under a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a bravery, than with purpose to attempt upon these bold fellows any further. For he knew well that his Brothers death had secured his Estate, whom he would soon have slain with his own hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give Reputation to his Valour; and this Reputation he thought that he might now preserve well enough, by shewing a manly look half a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displayed on the top of a Spear. This Ensign might have encouraged his People, had not some of the Greeks espied it, who not minding that he should abide so near them, with all their Power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled upon the Spur, so that none remained in the place of Battel, save only the Greeks, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harm, than that one of them was hurt with an Arrow. Much they wondered that they heard no news of Cyrus, but thinking that he was pursuing the Army, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to return to their Quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good Appetite, because the expectation of the Kings coming had given them no leisure to Dine.

§. V.

The hard Estate of the Greeks after the Fight; and how Artaxerxes in vain sought to have made them yield unto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sun, and they bringing home dark Night with them, found their Camp spoiled, liels or nothing being left, that might serve for Food: so that wanting Victuals to satiate their hunger, they refreshed their weary Bodies with Sleep. In the mean season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entered by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the baseness of his People, and weakness of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greeks: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shameful demeanor of his Army, should live to carry Tidings Home, it would not be long ere with greater Forces they disturbed with him for his whole Signory. Wherefore he resolved to try all means, whereby he might bring them to distraction, and not let one escape to carry Tidings of that which he had seen: to which purpose he sent them a brave Message the next morning. Charging them to deliver up their Arms, and come to his Gate, to wait there upon his Mercy. It seems that he was in good hope to have found their high Courages broken, upon report of his Brothers Death; but he was greatly deceived in that thought: For the Greeks being advertised that morning from Arius, a principal Commander under Cyrus, that his Master being slain, he had retired himself to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to return into Ienia, his meaning was to dilodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would join with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer back to Arius, that having beaten the King out of the Field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arius himself in the Kings Throne, if he would join with them, and pursue the Victory. Before they received any reply to this Answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Camp, whose Errand seemed to the Captains very insolent: One told them that it was not for the Vanquishers to yield their Weapons; another, that he would die ere he yielded to such a Motion; a third asked, whether the King, as having the Victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of Friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesy he meant to requite their Kindness. To this question Phalimus a Grecian, waiting upon Tisaphernes, answered; That the King having slain Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the midst whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their Throats, for which cause he accounted them his Prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalimus, that having nothing left, but their Arms and Valour, whilst they kept their Arms their Valour would be forcible, but should they yield them, it was to be doubted, that their Bodies would not long remain their own. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying; This young man did seem a Philosopher, and made a pretty Speech; but that his deep speculation shewed his Wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Arms and his Valour to prevail against the great King. It seems that Phalimus being a Courtier, and employed in a Business of importance, thought himself too profound a States-man, to be checked in his Ennobbage by a bookish Discourser. But his Wisdom herein failed him. For whatsoever he himself was (of whom no more is known than that he brought an unbonneted Message to his own Countrymen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons and Lives to the merciless Barbarians) this young Scholar by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principal Commanders were surprised by Treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having never seen the Wars before, undertook the Conduct of the Army, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithful to the King, as they had been to Cyrus, offering their service in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have use of them. But the final answer was, That without Weapons they could neither do the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalimus delivered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing War if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their Answer. Clarus the General told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalimus) must I understand you? as choosing Peace if we stay, otherwise War, said Clarus. But whether War or Peace? quoth this politike Embassador. To whom Clarus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose.) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him no wiser than he came. All that day the Greeks were fain to feed upon their Horfes, Asles, and other Beasts, which they roasted with Arrows, Darts, and wooden Targets thrown away by their Enemies.

How the Greeks began to return Homewards.

AT night they took their way towards Arius, to whom they came at mid-night, using torriken by four hundred Foot, and forty Horse, all Thracians, who had over to the King, by whom how they were enquired, I use not find. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces: for had they they been kindly used, it may well be thought that some of them should have accompanied Tissaphernes, and served as Stales to draw in the rest. Arius being of too base a Temper and Birth, to think upon seeking the Kingdom for himself, with such assistance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make Covenant with them for mutual assistance unto the last: Whereunto both parts having sworn, he advised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieve them with Victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearisome March, and tired the Soldiers, they found the Kings Army which had coasted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purposed themselves to have encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seem by declining them to show fear or weakness. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their Betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former Behaviour; nor strange, that the Grecians being weary and hungry, and lying among Enemies in an unknown Country, should be very fearful; but it is almost past belief, that the Noise which was heard of these poor men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition imported them to do, should make the Persians fly out of their Camp, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Arms, he should crave Peace of them. The next day very early, came Messengers from Ariaxerxes, desiring free access for Embassadors to entreat of Peace. Were it not that such particulars do best open the quality of the Persians, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter to run over the general passages of those times, than to dwell among Circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for Battle, because the Greeks (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to hear of Truce till their Bellies were full; Ariaxerxes dissembling the Indignity, was contented sweetly to swallow down this Pill, sending them Guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of Victuals to relieve them.

§. VII.

How Tissaphernes under colour of Peace, betrayed all the Captains of the Greeks.

Hitherto the Greeks relying upon their own Verue, had rather advanced their Affairs, than brought themselves into any frights or terms of disadvantage. But now came unto them the subtil Fox Tissaphernes, who circumventing the chief Commanders by fine slights, did maliciously entrap them, to the extreme danger of the Army. He told them that his Province lying near unto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire that their Deliverance might be wrought by his Procurement; knowing well, that in time to come, both they and their Countreimen at home would not be unthankful for such a Benefit. Herewithal he forgot not to rehearse the great service that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Cyrus his intent, and having not only brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of Battle shewed his face to the Greeks, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Camp, and gave chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alledge to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you safe into Greece; in which Suit I have good hope to speed, if you will send a mild answer to him, who hath willed me to ask you, for what cause you have born Arms against him. The Captains hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he said) that Peace should be granted: the Conditions whereof were; That they should pass freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for what they took, and committing no spoil: yet that it should be lawful for them to take Victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereunto both parties having sworn, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the King to take leave, and end all business, came unto them again after twenty days, and then they left forward. This interim of twenty days, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministered great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breed doubt; the Brethren and Kindred of Arius repining daily to him, and other Persians to his Soldiers, did work him and them to wish assurance of Pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greeks than formerly he had been. This caused many to advise Clearchus, rather to pass forward as well as he might, than to rely upon Covenants, and sit still whilst the King laid snares to entrap them. But he on the contrary perswaded them to rest contented whilst they were well, and not to cast themselves again into those Difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treaty; reciting withal their own Wants, and the Kings Means, but especially the Oaths mutually given and taken, wherewith he saw no reason why the Enemy should have clogged himself if he meant mischief, having Power enough to do them harm by a fair and open War.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if Honour may be valued by Greatness and Place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; for as much as no enforcement, or base respect was like to have drawn it from him. But his Falshood was such, both in substance and in success, as may fitly expound that Saying, which proceeded from the fountain of Truth, I hate a rich Man a Liar. A lye may find excuse when it grows out of fear: for that Passion hath his originall from weakness. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of Untruth, the Falshood is most abominable; for the Offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his own strength against the Divine Justice, doth commit that sin with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure Vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found means to destroy all the Captains, whom he subtilly got into his Power by a Train; making the General Clearchus himself the mean to draw in all the rest. The business was contrived thus: having travelled some days together, in such wise, that the Persians did not encamp with the Greeks, who were very jealous of the great Familiarity appearing between Tissaphernes, and Arius; Clearchus thought it convenient to root out of Tissaphernes his brains all causes of distrust, whereof many had grown in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private Conference with him, he rehearsed the Oath of Confederacy, which had past between them, shewing how religiously he meant to keep it; and repeating the benches, which the Greeks did receive by the help of Tissaphernes, he promised that their love should appear to him not unfruitful, if he would make use of their service against the Myrians or Phidians, who were accustomed to infect his Province; or against the Aegyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all Divine and Humane respects had linked them together, he would not give place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sudden inconvenience to either of them, upon no just ground. The faithless Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministered fair occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to mind how many ways he could have used to bring them to confusion, without peril to himself, especially by burning the Country, through which they were to pass, whereby they must needs have perished by meer Famine. For which cause he said that it had been great folly, to seek by Perjury, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands: But the truth was, that his own love to them had moved him to work their safety, not only for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himself, and the King, by their assistance; but for that he might by their Friendship, hope to obtain what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captains with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissension between them. Clearchus himself being thus deceived, with great importunity drew all the chief Commanders, and many of the inferior Leaders to repair with him to the Camp of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Soldiers, as it had been to some common Fair. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principal Colonels were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a sign was given, upon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slain. Forthwith certain bands of Persian Horse-men scoured the Field, killing as many Greeks as they met; and riding up to the very Camp of the Grecians, who wondered much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping formerly wounded, informed them of all that had been done. Hereupon the Greeks took Arms in haste, thinking that the Enemy would forthwith have assailed their Camp. Anon they might perceive the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his own Brother, and Arius, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principal men in the Army, saying, That they brought a Message from the King, which Arius delivered to this effect. That Clearchus having broken his Faith, and the League made, was justly rewarded with death; that Memon and Proxenus, two other of the five Colonels, for detecting his Treachery, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to surrender their Arms, which were due to him, as having belonged unto his Servant Cyrus. When some altercation arose upon this Message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had been in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished:

but he willed them to send back Memon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common Friends to both Nations, the Greeks might be advised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any Reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other four were sent to Ariaxerxes, by whose commandment their Heads were stricken off. I hold it not amiss to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousness of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province waisted by the Greeks, against whom, receiving from his Master convenient aid of Men and Money, he did so ill manage his Affairs, that neither Subtlety nor Perjury (to which he failed not to have recourse) availing him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning Head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who took it from his Shoulders. Such was the recompence of his Treachery, which made him so mistrusted at Home, that the Service which he could not do, he was thought upon private ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to fly from the stroke, all the World being thus against him. But now let us return to the Prosperity, wherein he triumphed without great cause, having betrayed braver men than himself, and intending to bring the like mischief upon the whole Army.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greeks, and in despite of Tissaphernes went off safely.

Great was the heaviness of the Soldiers, being now destitute of Leaders, and no less their fear of the evil hanging over their Heads, which they knew not how to avoid. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose Learning supplied his want of Experience, finding the deep sadness of the whole Army to be such, as hindered them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, began to advise the under-Officers of Proxenus his Companies, whose familiar Friend he had been, to bethink themselves of some mean, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Soldiers encouraged; setting before their Eyes whatsoever might serve to give them hope, and above all, perswading them in no wise to yield to the mercy of their Barbarous Enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take upon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same Night calling up such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were slain, or taken. This being done, and order set down for disturbing the Army of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the loss of Tissaphernes his assistance, hoping to take Victuals by force better cheap than he had been wont to sell them: To which purpose they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentiful Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to pass them where they were fordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, serving all on foot, were not able to requit for the harm which they received by the Persian Archers, who thort at a farther distance than the Greeks could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide Slings, wherewith he over-reached the Enemy; and finding some Horses fit for service, that were employed among the Carriages, he set men upon them; training likewise his Archers, to shoot compass, who had been accustomed to the point-blank. By these means did he bear off the Perfians, who assailed him; and sometimes gave them chase with that band of fifty Horses, which being well back'd, with a firm body of Foot-men, and seconded with Troops of the light-armed-foot and fencers, compelled the Enemy to lie a-loof. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handy-gripes with these resolute men, did possess the tops of Mountains, and places of advantage, by which they were to pass. But finally, when their Valour made way through all such difficulties, he betook himself to that course, which was indeed the surest, of burning the Country. With great sorrow did the Greeks behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of Victuals cut off. Some advised to defend the Country, as granted by the Enemy himself to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Perfians might be affrighted to do that which were the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; but these were faint comforts. The best counsel was, That being near unto the Carduchi, a People Enemy to the Perfians, they should enter into their Country, passing over some high Mountains which lay between them. This course they followed, which could not have availed them if Tissaphernes had begun sooner to cut off their Victuals, rather than to seek to force, or to circumvent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greek Army found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

ENtering upon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountered with many difficulties of ways, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Perfians, were no way inferior to the Greeks in daring, but only in the Art of War. They were very light of foot, skillful Archers, and used the Sling well; which Weapons in that Mountainous Country, were of much use against these poor Travellers, afflicting them in seven days, which they spent in that passage, far more than all the power of the great King had done. Between the Territory of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ran Centrites, a great River, upon which the Greeks refreshed themselves one day, rejoicing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prove easy. But the next Morning they saw certain Troops of Horses, that lay to forbid their passage. These were levied by the Kings Deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companions having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broad and deep, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite banks. To increase these dangers the Carduchi following upon them, lay on the side of a Mountain, within less than a mile of the Water. But it was their good hap to discover a Ford, by which the greater number of them passing over, did easily chase away the Subjects of the Perfians; and then sending back the most expedite men, gave succour to the Rear-ward, against which the Carduchi being slightly Armed, could not on plain ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seem to have inhabited the Mountains of Niphates, which are not far from the Spring of Tigris; though Protemy place them far more to the East upon the River of Cyrrus in Media, wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded upon his own knowledge, doth best in this case deserve credit. Of the River Centrites (as of many other Rivers, Towns, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may endure the severity of a Critick. For Protemy, and the whole Nation of Geographers, add small light to this expedition; only of this last, I think it the same which falleth into Tigris, not much above Artasagarta, springing out of Niphates, and running by the Town of Sardava in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greeks, having passed Centrites, did arrive.

§. X.

How Teribazus, Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greeks with terms of feigned Peace, was disappointed, and shamefully beaten.

THE Army finding in Armenia good Provision, marched without any disturbance about fifty or three score miles to the heads of the River Tigris, and passing over them, travelled as far further without resistance, till they were encountered by Teribazus at the River Telobia, which Xenophon commends as a goodly Water, though small; but Protemy and others omit it. Teribazus governed that Country for the Perfians, and was in great favour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seem to have been a School where the Art of falsehood was taught as wisdom. He desired Peace of the Greeks, which was made upon this condition, That they should take what they pleased, but not burn down the Towns and Villages in their way. As soon as he had made this League, he levied an Army, and besetting the Straights of certain Mountains which they were to pass, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might give him the commendations of being no less craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of success. For a great Snow fell, which caused the Greeks to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandered about seeking relief. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken Prisoner, the whole Plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greeks, taking this Captive with them for a Guide, sought him out; and coming upon his Camp, did so affright him, that before the whole Army could arrive there, the hour which was raised by the Vault-couriers, chased him away. They took his Pavilion, wherein (besides many Slaves, that were Artificers of Volupuousness) very rich Furniture was left by the treacherous Coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Army went North-ward, and passing Emprates, not far below the Springs thereof, travelled with much difficulty through deep Snow, being followed aloof by the Enemy, who durst not approach behind, but did cut off such as they found straggling behind. The Inhabitants of the Country, through which they marched, had their Wintering-houses under Ground, wherein was found great plenty of Victuals and of Cattel, which likewise did Winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Having refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable Journey, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond slaves, and taking taking a way (besides other Horses and Cattel) some Cols that were bred up for the great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Army to Trabisfond, through the Countries bordering upon the River of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the River Phasis, near whereunto the People called Phasienses, Taochi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations joyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountains, which the Greeks were to pass, made countenance of War: but some Companies being sent by Night to seize upon a place of equal height to that whereon the Enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these People to flee, every one retiring to the defence of his own. The first upon whole Country the Greeks did enter were the Taochi, who conveying all their provision of Victuals into strong holds, brought the Army into much want, until with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of Cattel were taken; the People, to avoid Captivity, threw themselves head-long down the Rocks, the very Women throwing down first their own Children, and then casting themselves upon them. Here was taken a great booty of Cattel, which served to feed them, travelling through the Land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greeks hand to hand, killing many as they took Prisoners, and cutting off their Heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great grief of their companions living; who were glad, when after seven days Journey they escaped from those continual Skirmishes, wherewith they had been vexed by these Barbarians. Hence travelling through a good Corn-Country, inhabited by an obscure Nation, called the Soylini, they came to a rich Town, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoining, used them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountain, whence they might discover the Euxine-Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Town) he led them through the Territory of his Enemies, desiring them to waste it with Sword and Fire. After five days march, they came to a Mountain called Teches, being (as I think) a part of the Mountains called Molchici, whence their Guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by means of an Interpreter, found among themselves, who born in that place had been sold into Greece, they made a good Peace) they arrived in the Land of Colchis, wherein stands the City of Trabisfond, called then Trapesas, a Colony of the Greeks. The Colchians entertaining them with hostility, were required with the like; for the Army, having now good leisure to repose themselves among their Friends the Trabisfondians, did spoil the Country thirty days together, forbearing only the Borders upon Trabisfond, at the Citizens request.

§. XII.

How the Army began at Trabisfond to provide a Fleet; wherewith to return home by Sea: how it came into the Territory of Sinope, and there projected the same purpose to effect.

HAVING now found a Haven-Town, the Souldiers were desirous to take Shipping, and change their tedious Land-journeys into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cerisyphus, a Lacedaemonian, one of the principal Commanders, promised by means of Anaxibium the Lacedaemonian Admiral, who was his Friend, that he would provide Vessels to imbarque them. Having thus concluded, they likewise took order for the staying of such Ships as should pass that way, meaning to use them for their Navigation. Left all this provision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Army, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoining to clear the ways, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were utterly unwilling to give ear, being desirous to return by Sea: but the Country fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophon's request. Two Ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring Ships into the Port of Trabisfond: the other took Merchants and Passengers, whose Goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were faine to increase the Fleet. After long abode, when the Vessels began to fail, by reason that all the Land of the Colchis, near unto the Camp, was already quite wasted, they were faine to embark their sick men, with the Women, Children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few Ships which they had already provided. The rest of which they took their way by Land to Caryssa, a Greek Town, where the Fleet likewise arrived. Here the Army being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Country of the Molynaci, who were divided into Factions. The stronger party, desiring their Friendship, caused them to joyn with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was Caryssa, a Greek Town likewise, and a Colony of the Sinopians, Port-town as Trapesas and Caryssa were; but the entertainment which they found was very cheerful, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick men that were among them admitted into any House. Hereupon the Souldiers entered the Town by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sick in convenient Lodgings, taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Army they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Town. These measures were unwelcome to the Town, whence Embassadors were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatening to joyn with the Paphlagonians, if redress could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meer Necessity had enforced the Army to reach those of Caryssa good manners in so bad a method; letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonians at once, though perhaps the Paphlagonians would be glad to take Sinope it self; to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this this answer the Embassadors grew better advised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could then; and commanding the Town of Coryra to relieve the Soldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with Shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would prove, in regard of the many and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Helys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good Counsel, and the fair promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Army, which well perceived, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would pass the rest of the way by Sea; provided, that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serve to Embark every one man of them, then would they not put from the shoar.

§. XIII.

Of Dissension which arose in the Army; and how it was Embarked.

Hitherto the danger of Enemies, and miseries of Weather and Wants, had kept the Company in firm unity; which now began to dissolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring Air of Greece, warming their Heads with private respects to their several ends and purposes. Whil实现 they, who were sent as Agents from the Camp, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunity of the Coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable work to build a City in those parts, which were soon like to prove great and wealthy, in regard both of their own puissance, and of the great repair of the Greeks into that quarter. For this cause he made Sacrifice, according to the superstition of his Time and Country, divining of his Success by the entrails of Beasts. The South-fayer whom he employed, had received a great Reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give Battle in ten days: he therefore having preserved his Money carefully, was desirous to be soon at home, that he might freely enjoy his Gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diversity of mens Opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this Consultation, were sore afraid, lest the Poverty of the Soldiers, who had not wherewith to maintain themselves at home, should give success to the Project. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Army with a sufficient Fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captains, who thereupon undertook to get the Soldiers Pay, if they would presently set sail for Greece. One of these Captains being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; an other offered to lead them into Chersonesus. Xenophon who desired only the common Good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that he would have them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traitor that should forsake the Army, before such time as they were arrived at their Journeys end. Sitaneus the South-fayer, who had uttered Xenophon's purpose, was hereby flayed from outrunning his Fellows, and driven to abide with his Wealth among poor men, longer than stood with his good liking. Also the other Captains were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived that Ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation, but that the Money promised to them, and by them to the Soldiers, came not. For the People of Sinope and Heraclea, knowing that the Army was now resolved for the Voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had persuaded them to this resolution, thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Navy whil实现 they were in good readiness to depart, but to keep the money to themselves. The Captains therefore who being disappointed by these Towns, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with fair hopes, repented much of their hasty orders, and signifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make proposition to the Army, of taking the Ships, and failing to Phasis, where they might seize upon Lands, and plant themselves in such place as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the business, they began to work the principal of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These news becoming publick, bred a suspicion of Xenophon, as if he had won the rest of the Captains to his purpose, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherefore at assembling the Companies, he gave them satisfaction, and withal complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redress. A general Inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus, which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Coryras, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending Presents desired peace of the Greeks: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have been sought, for that the Greeks weigh now their Fleet in a readiness, did soon heave Anchors, and set sail for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whether Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promised to give the Army Pay as soon as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIV.

Another great Dissension and Distraction of the Army. How the Mutinies were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

THE nearer they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not return home empty handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Army were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose favour, as well the Captains as the common Soldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedaemonians, who were jealous of him already (being conceived by that Fugitive who forsook the Army at Trebizand, flying with one of their two Ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the entrails, that threatened ill success to his Government, procured with vehement contention, that this Honour was laid upon Cherisophus a Lacedaemonian. It seems that Xenophon, considering the vexations incident to the conduct of a voluntary Army, wanting Pay, did wisely in yielding to such Tokens as forbade him to accept it: especially, knowing how well their desire, which was, by night or by wrong to get Wealth wheresoever it might be found, without all regard of Friend or of Foe. Cherisophus

Chap. X.

phus had been General but six or seven days when he was deposed, for having been unwilling to rob the Town of Heraclea, which had sent Presents to the Camp, and been very beneficial unto them in lending Ships for their transportation. Two days they had failed by the Coast of Asia, when being past those great Rivers, which would have given impediment to their Journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one ridiculous man began to put them in mind of leaving to get somewhat for themselves; telling them that, all their Provision would be spent in three days, and that being now come out of the Enemies Country, Victuals, and other necessities could not be had without Money; for which cause he gave advice to send Messengers into the Town of Heraclea, giving the Citizens to understand what their Wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of Money, called Cyzicenes, which sum amounted to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyzicenes at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being General, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vain, for they both refused it, and renounced the Action as dishonest. Left therefore either of these should fail in managing the business which agreed not with his Disposition, others of more impudency and less discretion were sent, who in such wise delivered their insolent Message; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate upon their Request, brought what they could out of the Fields into the Town, and shutting the Gates, did notwithstanding man the Walls. When the Soldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their ravenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians, and Acheans, they forsook immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their own number. Above four thousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten Captains, failed unto the Port of Calpas, which is in the mid way between Heraclea and Bizantium, with purpose to assail the Bythinians on the sudden. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom, one thousand and four hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand Foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and forty Horse, which small Band had done good service already, and could not have been spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governour of Bizantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calpas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to convey him over to Greece; for which cause he took his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon such Shipping as they had, who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed upon the Confines of Heraclea, and Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the Mid-land Country to the Propont. The Mutinies who had landed at Calpas by night, with purpose to take Spoils in Bythia, divided themselves into ten Companies, every Captain leading his own Regiment into some Village, five or six miles from the Sea: in the greater Towns were two Regiments quartered, and so was that part of the Country furnished on the sudden, and lacked all at one time. The place of Rendezvous was an high piece of Ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaping, the rest were all put to the Sword. For the Thracians which had slipped at first out of the Soldiers hands, did raise the Country, and finding the Greeks laden with Booty, took the advantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, or compassing the Hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from these Arcadians and Acheans: who wanting the assistance of Horse, and having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to stand merely upon their defence, bearing off with great danger, and many Wounds received, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven from their watering place, and enforced to crave Parly. Whatsoever Articles of composition were, the Thracians yielded to all; but Pledges for assurance they would give none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such People, especially to incensed, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the Inland Region, did enquire of some Travellers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: and receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly thrown themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for Guides, them who gave him the Intelligence. His Horse-men he sent before to discover and to scour the ways; the light armed foot-men took the hill tops on either hand; all of them setting fire on whatsoever they found combustible, whereby the whole Country seemed to be on a slight Flame, to the great terror of the Enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a Hill, within five mile of the Arcadians, increasing still the number of his Fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after Supper. The Enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would have fallen upon them in the dark, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early the next morning Xenophon coming thither in very good order, to have given Battle, found that his advice to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they removed at break of day, and perceived by signs, that they had taken the way to the Port of Calpas, in which Journey he overtook them. They embraced him, and His with great joy, confessing that they themselves had thought the fame which the Enemies did, looking that he should have come by night, wherein finding themselves deceived, they were afraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away to overtake him, and join with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any motion to disjoin the Army, should suffer Death.

§. XV.

Of divers pieces of Service done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasion of the War between the Lacedæmonians and the Persian.

THE Haven of Calpas lay under a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kind of Grain and Fruits, except Olives. There was also Timber for Building and Shipping, and a very convenient Sea for a great City. All which Commodities that might have allured the Soldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them some device to have led them and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good means to live at home, neither did they so much for hope of gain follow Cyrus in that War, as in regard of his Honour, and the Love which they bore unto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wives and Children, to whom (though falling of the Riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to return. But whether it were so that Xenophon found advantage by their own superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signs appearing in the entrails, did indeed forbid their departure: so long they were informed to abide in the place till Victuals failed, neither would the Captains lead them forth to forage the Country, until the Sacrifices should promise good success. Cerëphus was dead of an Ague, and his Ships were gone, being returned to the Horacians, of whom they were borrowed. His Followers were joynd to the rest of the Army, which the greater it was, the more Provision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Colonel into the place of Cerëphus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Soldiers with the spoil of some Villages that stood near at hand; in which Enterprize he found ill success, the whole Country lying in wait to engraip him, and an Army of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Viceroy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which Troops falling upon the Greeks that were scattered abroad in seeking Booty, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certain Mountain thereby. The news of this Overthrow coming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army to the rescue of those that survived, and brought them safe to the Camp, upon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the Enemy, together with the present condition of the Army, so disheartened and unfurnished of necessities, caused the Greeks to remove their Camp to a place of more strength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure travail, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to bury those which were lately slain, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their Assiliants. In this Journey his Demeanour was very Honourable. For having given Burial to the Dead, the Enemy was discovered lying on the tops of the Hills adjoining, to whom (notwithstanding that the Way was very rough and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backs a Wood scarce passable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the Enemy with half the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many, and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarian, he would not fail with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom, if they could safely retire to the Camp, yet what should they do there, wanting Victuals to sustain them in the place, and Ships to carry them away: wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their Dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the unsafe return, which might serve to stay Cowards from running away, but to with unto the Enemy a fair and easy Way, by which he might fly from them. These persuasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the Field, abandoned the Country forthwith, removing their Families, and leaving all that could not suddenly be conveyed away to the discretion of the Greeks, who at good leisure gathered the Harvest of these bad Neighbours Fields. This was the last Fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enjoy the Spoil of the Country, but when the Opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony on the Port of Calpas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour People, to desire Friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Soldiers had no mind to stay. Wherefore entering further into Bythinia, they took a great Boory, which they carried away to Cerëphus, a City near unto Chelædon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly fear, lest their long stay in that Country might breed in them a desire to visit his Province, where they might have found great Wealth, and little Power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedæmonian Admiral, entreating him with much instance and large promises to wait them over into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admiral confederating, promised to give the Soldiers Pay, as soon as they arrived at Bizantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the entreaty of the Persian, who in the height of his Pride, had thought them so fully implored with mighty Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Arms into his hands, and so to yield their Lives to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they seized upon Bizantium, which by Xenophon's persuasion they forbore to sack, I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertain little to the general course of things. But this expedition, as in all Ages it was glorious, so did it both discover the secrets of Asia, and stir up the Greeks to think upon greater enterprizes than ever their Forefathers had undertaken. Likewise it was the only remarkable Action which the time afforded. For the Roman Wars did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Towns of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seeds of the War shortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made upon Artaxerxes, were already sown, before these Companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Towns of Ionis, which had sided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebel, which they thought safer than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Province, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedæmonians to send them aid, whereby to recover recover their Liberty; and obtained their request.

For a power was sent over, under conduct of Timbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Towns as had already revolted, to secure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offensive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Affairs of Greece, whilst they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

§. I.

How the Lacedæmonians took courage by example of Xenophon's Army, to make War upon Artaxerxes.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the War in Asia.

IT seems that the Lacedæmonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes took their favour shewed unto his Brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open War against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no advantage might slip, which could serve to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian work beyond the Sea. But when Xenophon's Army had revealed the baseness of those effeminate Asiatiques, and rehearsed the many Victories which they themselves had gotten, upon terms of extreme disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of undertaking upon this huge unwieldy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joyned forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon; and further, finding no power that was able to give them resistance, in all that long Journey of four and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five Furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English Miles about four thousand two hundred fourscore and one, a very painful march of one Year and three Months. Nevertheless the Civil distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torn, and especially that hot fire of the Theban War, which kindled with Persian Gold, brake forth suddenly into a great flame, drew back out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their own Estate; leaving it questionable whether Agesslaus, having both the fame, and far greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two Years, which he spent in Asia, his deeds procured more commendation of Magnanimity and fair Behaviour, than of stout Courage, and great, or profitable Achievements. For how highly soever it pleased Xenophon, who was his Friend, and follower in this, and in other Wars, to extol his virtue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying near the Sea, carry no proportion to Xenophon's own Journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retreat of Cunus the British with six thousand men from Aquileia, to his own Country, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Tiberius, being rather like it than equal. But of Agesslaus, and his Wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speak more in due place.

§. II.

Timbro receiving Xenophon's men, began to take in Towns, and to entertain all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had been highly beholding to the King; who seem to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to live under the Government of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Master did love him. The managing of the War begun by Timbro, was for his Oppressions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercylidas a Spartan, who behaved himself as a good Man of War, and a wife Commander. For whereas the Rule of the Low-Countries of Asia was divided between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree; Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes favour the greater, and having the chief Command in those Wars against the Greeks; Dercylidas, who did bear a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischievous Nature, and would not be sorry to see his Cornival thoroughly beaten, though to the Kings loss) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was under the Jurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province, in few days, he brought into his own power.

That Country of Æolis had about the fame time suffered a violent alteration, which gave easie space to the attempts of Dercylidas. Zenis, a Dardanian, had been Deputy to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death, his Wife Mania procured his Office, wherein the behaved her self so well, that the one only was beloved of the People under her Government, but enlarged her Territory; by the Conquest of certain Towns adjoining; and sundry times gave assistance to Pharnabazus in his Wars against the Mysians and Pisidians. For he had in pay some Companies of Greeks, whose Valour by her good usage did her great service. But somewhat before the arrival of Dercylidas in those parts, a Son-in-law of hers, called Misias, whom the trusted and loved much, being blinded with Ambition, found means to stifle her, and kill her Son of seventeen years old; which done, he seized upon two of her principal Towns, wherein her Treasure lay, hoping to have been admitted into possession of her whole Estate. Being denied entrance by her Soldiers, that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with Presents to Pharnabazus.

hazards, desiring him to make him Governor in the place of Mania. His Presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foul Treason threatened; whereby the wicked Villain was driven into terms of almost utter desperation. In the mean time came Dercylidas to whom the Towns of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One only Town stood out four days (against the will of the Citizens, who were covetous of Liberty) the Governor striving in vain to have kept it to the use of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergebe and Seppis, which the Traytor held, who fearing all men, as being loved of none, sent Embassadors to Dercylidas, desiring leave to speak with him, and pledges for his security: upon the delivery of which he filled out of Seppis, and coming into the Camp, made offer to joy in with the Greeks upon such Conditions, as might seem reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercylidas, that other Condition there was none, than to let the Citizens freely at liberty. And presently upon these words they marched toward Seppis. When Midias perceived that it was in vain to live against the Army, and the Townsmen, who were all of one mind, he quietly went along with Dercylidas, who remaining but a few hours in the City, did a Sacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergebe. Midias did not forsake his Company, but followed him, earnestly entreating that he might be suffered to retain Gergebe: but coming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Soldiers that they should be opened; for (quoth Dercylidas) I must here likewise do a Sacrifice to Minerva. The Traytor, not daring to make denial, caused his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercylidas, taking possession of the place, tendered pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serve under his Ensigns. This done, all the Goods of Mania were seized upon, as belonging to one that had been subject to Pharnabazus, who was Enemy to the Greeks: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might find any place to hide his detested Head. Dercylidas, having in eight days taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates, to Winter in Bythinia, to which end he took Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of War. That Winter, and the Summer ensuing, the Truce being re-continued held; in which time, besides the waiting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joining Chersonese to the Main, was fortified, being four or five miles in breadth, by which means eleven Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wild Thracians, and made fit and able to victual the Camp. Likewise the City of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with Provision. After this, Dercylidas had command from Sparta, to divert the War into Caria, where was the seat of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not unuseful to recover all the Towns of Ionis: Pharnas, the Admiral of the Fleet (which was a yearly Office) being appointed to join with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his own danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus, having respect to the Kings Service, came to assist his private Enemy Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons in to all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Asia, hoping to find the Towns ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keep the War from their own doors, so was Dercylidas willing to free his Confederates from the spoil and danger of the War, by joining with the Ionians; for which cause he paid the River of Maender, and not looking to have been so soon encountered, marched carelessly through the Country; when on the very sudden the whole Army of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discovered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercenary Greeks, who were all marshalled in very good order to present Battle. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readiness, as also in advantage of ground: for the Persians had a great multitude of Horse, the Greek very few and feeble, being to fight in an open Plain. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Islanders and others, of such places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for flame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Only Dercylidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their Honour, prepared to endure the fight; which must needs have brought them to destruction, if the counsel of Pharnabazus had been followed, who perceiving the opportunity of so great a Victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a Coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, began to consider what strange defence the Soldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greeks were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to crave Parley; the conclusion of which was, That a Truce should be made, to last until Tissaphernes might receive answer from the King, and Dercylidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, that all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their own Liberty and Laws; but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedaemonians should depart Asia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it served to free the Greeks from the present danger, and to gain time unto Tissaphernes, who desired to avoid the War by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to finish by trial of a Battle.

§. III.

How the Lacedaemonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old displeasure. The dissentions of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the mean season the Lacedaemonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to account for some disgraces received by them during the late Wars, when leisure was wanting to the requital of such petty injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympian Games, had set a Fine upon the City of Sparta: for non-payment of which, they forbade them to come to the Solemnity, and publicly whipt one of them, that was a man of note, for presuming to contend against their Decree. Likewise they hindered Agas, King of Sparta, from doing Sacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points used great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no business that could hinder them from taking revenge: and therefore sent a premonitory Message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the usual pretence which they made the ground of all their Wars; though little they cared for the liberty of such Towns, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meer Vassals to themselves. In their late Wars with Athens, the strong opposition which they found caused this goodly Title of Liberty to work very flowly: but having now to do with a State of great spirit and small force, it gave present success to their desires. Two years together they sent an Army into the Country of the Eleans: the first year an Earthquake (held in those times a prodigious sign, and which did always forbid the prosecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second year, all the Towns of the Eleans did hastily revolt, and the City it self was driven to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to have her own Walls thrown down. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian Games was left unto them; which, it was not to be doubted, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this Expedition all the Greeks were assiduous to the Lacedaemonians, excepting the Corinthians and Boeotians, whose aid having been of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian War, as the force of Sparta it self, they could not smother their dislike of their unequal division following the Victory; which gave to Sparta the Command of all Greece: to Thebes and Corinth, only security against Athens; but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equal greatness of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutral Common-wealths to adhere to either, as the condition of their affairs required: but when to revenge injuries, they had by mortal hatred prosecuted the War to extremity, leaving the one City naked of Power and Friends, the other mightily increased in both, it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatness which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to provoke it. Nevertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any Quarrel, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by Victory or Composition made some good end with the Persians, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. IV.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His War with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death, and the War diverted into another Province, through persuasion and gifts of Tithraustes his Successor. How careless the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

Agesilaus newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to have the honour of the Victory, which, not without cause, he expected upon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Army to join with that of Dercylidas, he took his way in great Pomp to Aulis in Boeotia, a Haven, lying opposite to the Island of Euboea, in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the War against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon he meant also to do Sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Country, would not permit; but finding, that the performance of such Ceremonies in that place, belonged unto their Officers; they were so unable to conceal their malice, that finding some Companies of Horse, they threw down his Sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himself and his Country in any new War; therefore, waiting better opportunity of Revenge, he quietly [f]ollowed the contumely, and followed his main intentment. Having landed his men at Ephesus; he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treaty of Peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persians should restore to liberty all the Greek Towns in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the mean while make Truce. Truce was therefore made; which Tissaphernes had sought only to win time of making provision for the War, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilst Agesilaus was busie in settling the Estates of his Confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from War was at the coming down of these Forces which Artaxerxes had sent; at what time Agesilaus received a plain Message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forthwith depart out of Asia, or make good his word by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word that he was glad to hear that his Enemies had by Perjury deserved vengeance from Heaven, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Towns which lay between him and Caria, that they should provide Victuals, and other Necessaries for his Army, did easily make Tissaphernes believe, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was unfit for Herce, in which part of his Forces the Persians had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of Foot in Caria, entred with his Horse into the Plains of Maender, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heavy foot-Army, not suffering them to pass into that Country which was firest for their Service. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vain, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they took great spoil without resistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small Skirmish having the better of the Greeks, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelve men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiving by that trial how hard it would be to prevail, and hold the mastery of the Field, without a greater strength of Horse, took all possible care to increase that part of his Forces. By which means having enabled himself, whilst Winter lasted, he entered upon the Country of Tissaphernes, as soon as the season of the year would permit, and not only took a great booty, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the Plain of Maender, without assistance of their Infantry, he gave them Battle, and had a great Victory, taking their Camp, in which he found great Riches. The blame of this loss fell heavy upon Tissaphernes, who either upon Cowardice had abashed himself from the Battle, or following some other business, was then at Sardes. For which cause his Master having him in distrust, and thinking that Peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greeks, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the Head of Tissaphernes, and succeed him in the Government. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by Perjury he could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much over-weening of his own Wisdom, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himself most perfect. For supposing, that by his great skill in subtil Negotiation he should one way or other circumvent the Greeks, and make them weary of Asia, he did not seek to finish the War; and, according to his Masters will, bring all things speedily to quiet; but rather to temporise, till he might find some opportunity of making such end as best might stand with the Kings Honour and his own. Wherein it seems that he much mistook his Princes Disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aid which he did bring in his time of danger, yet he would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found such means whereby the danger it self might have been avoided: as not loving to have War, whilst by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtain Peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tisbrautes took at his first possession of the Low-Countries. For he sent Embassadors to Agesslaus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the Man who had been Author of the War, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greeks enjoy their own Laws and Liberty, upon condition, that they should pay him the Tribute accustomed, and the Army be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this Proposition, was by Agesslaus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the mean season he was content to transfer the War into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tisbrautes, who bought his Departure with thirty Talents.

This was a strange manner of War, both on the Offensive and on the Defensive part. For Agesslaus having entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbear his several Provinces, at the entreaty of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintain his Estates against all Enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their Heads might easily be taken from their Shoulders) were little offended at any Loss that fell on their next Neighbour-Provinces, which were subject likewise to the same Crown of Persia, so long as their own Government could be preserved free from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deviously, as to the corrupted Estate of the Court, wherein Eumuchs, Concubines, and Ministers of pleasure, were able by partial Construction to countenance or disgrace the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so usual that it might be called a Rule) to reward or punish the Provincial Governors, according to the Benefit or Loss, which the Country given in charge unto each of them received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to pass, that as every one was desirous to make his own Territory yield a large Increase to the Kings Treasure; so no man was careful to assist his Borderers, if loss or danger might thereby grow to himself and his; but sat still as an idle Beholder, when perhaps by joining their Forces, it had not been unequal to recompence the spoil of one Country, by conquering another, or defending a third from far greater miseries.

§. V.

The War and Treaty between Agesslaus and Pharnabazus.

Agesslaus having thus compounded with Tisbrautes, entered Phrygia, burning and wasting the Country without resistance. He took the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant drove him out of his Camp. These actions, together with his honourable Behaviour, which added much to their Lustre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of strength, which might have increased his Power, and given assurance to the rest of his Proceedings: but purchased Fame and high Reputation, by which he drew unto him some that were discontented and stood upon bad terms with the great King, whom he lost again as easily, by means of some slight Injury done to them by his under Captains. Pharnabazus did not enclose himself in any Town for fear of being besieged, but kept the Field, lying as near as he could safely to the Enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not uneasy to do. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had been so great, that when he (obtaining Parly) did set before their eyes his Bounty towards them, and his Love (which had been such, that besides many other hazards of his Person, he had for the rescue of their Fleet, when it was driven to run ashore at Abydos, adventured to ride into the Sea as far as he could find any ground, and fight on Horseback against the Albionians) together with his Faith, which had never been violated in word or deed: they knew not how to execute their Ingratitude, otherwise than by telling him, That having War with his Master, they were informed, against their Will, to offend him. Agesslaus did make a fair offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them, they would maintain him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time only Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make War against them, he would not fail to do the best that he could as their Enemy; if the Charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himself to their Alliance. The Issue of this Parly was, That the Army should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor again return into it, whilst employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agesslaus, and the withdrawing of his Forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more necessary business elsewhere; but because his Country would yield great Booty; and for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedæmonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards required their unthankfulness with full revenge.

§. V I.

The great Commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with Gold from the Persian.

IN the mean while Tisbrautes perceiving that Agesslaus meant nothing less than to return into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, took a wife course, whereby the City of Sparta was not only driven to look to her own, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late Victories, and saw her Dominion restrained unto the narrow bounds of her own Territory. He sent into Greece fifty Talents of Silver, to be employed in raising War against the Lacedæmonians; which Treasure, was by the subtil practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wife dispersed, among the principal men of the Thebans, Argives, and Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly born secret hate to that of Sparta; were now desirous of nothing so much as of open War. And left this great heat of the incensed Maledice, should, for want of present exercise, begin to faint, and vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedæmonians into Arms, that they themselves might seem Authors of the Quarrel. Some Land there was in the Tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claim; but the Phocians, either Favour, had it adjudged unto them, the greater yearly Money for it. This Money the Locrians were either hired or persuaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning to lose their Rent, made a distress by strong hand, recovering a great deal more than their own; which they Thebans (as in protection of their own Tenants) requited with an Invasion made upon Phocia, wasting that Country in the manner of open War. Such were the beginnings of professed Hostility between Thebes and Sparta, and the first breaking out of their close Enmity, that had long time, though hardly been concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the Violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very favourable Audience, and ready consent to their Suit; it being the manner of the Lacedæmonians, to defer the acknowledgment of Injuries received, until occasion of revenge were offered, and then to discover their Indignation in cold Blood. At this time they had very good opportunity to work their own Wills, having no other War to disturb them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no news, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countries about Phocia, and with such Forces as he could levy, to attend the coming of Paulanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath been shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Paulanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians (who refused to assist him in that Enterprize) meaning to joyn with Lysander, and make a speedy end of the War. The consideration of so great a danger approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seek what help they could abroad, forasmuch as their own strength was far too little to make resistance against such mighty preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst utter in Countenance; but the good Wishes of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should do as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course to procure the assistance of some Esteem that might presently declare it self on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their Party strong. To this end they sent Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by public allowance, or done in time of the general War, and recomposed with Friendship lately shewn in their refusal of assisting Paulanias, when he came in behalf of the thirty Tyrants, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their own Honours sake, they requested them of aid in the present War, offering to do the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former Estate and Dignity. Thucydides and his Friends, who persecuted by the Thirty, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the City to make a large request of the courtesy which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aid the Lacedæmonians in this War; but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it self in their Cause. Whilst Paulanias lay still, waiting the arrival of his Confederates; Lysander being desirous to do somewhat that might advance the business in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Paulanias did not meet him, as had been appointed, yet he attempted the Town, and was slain in Fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this Victory did encourage the Thebans, so the coming of Paulanias with his great Army did again amaze them, with presentation of extrem danger; but their spirits were soon revived by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late Battle, Paulanias durst not hazard a new Fight with them, but receiving the Bodies of those that were slain, by composition, departed out of their Territory, for which, either Cowardice or Indifference, he was at his return to Sparta, condemned as a Traitor, and driven to fly into Tegæa, where he ended his days in banishment.

§. VII.

How Agesslaus was called out of Asia to help his Country. A Victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, assisted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedæmonian Fleet; recovers the Mastery of the Seas; and rebuilds the Walls of Athens.

THIS good Success, and the Confederacy made with Athens, gave such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Acarnanians, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Army, determined to give Battle to the Lacedæmonians, as near as they might to their own doors; considering that the Force of Sparta it self was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agesslaus, who readily obeyed them, and promising his Friends in Asia to return speedily to their assistance, passed the Straights of Hellaspont into Europe. In the mean time the Cities of the new League had given Battle to the Lacedæmonians, and the remainder of their Associates, but with ill success. For when the right Wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the Chafe in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left Wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the Victory of that day entirely their own. The report of this Battle meeting Agesslaus at Amphipolis, were by him sent over unto Asia, where it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his Friend, who had since his departure seen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admiral slain. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athensians into order, by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with Money, and all manner of Supplies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew third in Sea, when the City was depopulated of her old reputation, and scarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her own defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to have the Greeks divided into such Factions, as might utterly disable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himself, during these broils, to take such order, that he should not need any more, to seek Peace by treaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who unprovoked had fold his love for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight Ships, who had escaped, when the Fleet of Athens was surprized by Lysander at Ægospotami; giving him the command of a great Navy, wherewith he required the loss received at Ægospotami, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like destruction of their Fleet at Cnidus. After this Victory Conon sailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his Victory, so strong a Navy, and so much Gold, as encouraged the Athenians to re-build their Walls, and think more hopefully upon recovering the Signory which they had lost.

§. VIII.

Of sundry small Victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians lose all in Asia: The Athenians recover some part of their old Dominion.

NEvertheless the Lacedæmonians, by many Victories at Land, maintained for some years the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this loss at Sea. For Agessilaus obtained the better with his Horse-men, from the Thebans, who were accounted the best riders in Greece: He wasted Bœotia, and fought a great Battle at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marshal Gylis foraged the Country of Lerna: which done, he returned home.

The gain of these Victories was not great, and the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the Battles of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite unto them, and retired unbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agessilaus charged them in their return from the pursuit. Like-wise Gylis was slain with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with equal damage received in the parts adjoining; many Towns being easily taken, and as easily recovered. The variety of which inter-fests was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawn, by the loss of the Haven of Corinth, to sue for Peace, but could not get Audience, till such time as the news came of a great Victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian Forces at Lachæm; whereupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willing to do their Message, required only in scorn, to have a safe Conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the War was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Athenians, Confederates of Sparta, felt most loss; their whole State being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary side, until Agessilaus repayed these invaders with equal, or greater calamities, brought upon their own Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanians, that they were driven to sue for Peace. But the affairs at Sea were of most consequence, upon which the success of all depended. For when the Towns of Asia perceived, that the Lacedæmonians were not only entangled in an hard War at home, but almost disabled to pass the Seas, having lost their Fleet at Cnidus; they soon gave ear to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should use their own Laws, if they would expel the Spartan Governours. Only the City of Abydos did stand firm, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his best to contain all the Towns about Hellepont, in the Alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not do, because the Athenian Fleet under Thrasibulus took in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Isle of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgment of Athens.

The base Conditions offered unto the Persian by the Lacedæmonians. Of sundry Fights and other passages in the War. Of the Peace of Antalcidas.

ABOUT this time the Spartans began to perceive, how uneasy a thing it would be, to maintain the War against men as good as themselves, afflicted with the Treasures of Persia; wherefore they craved Peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering, not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Asia, and to leave them to the Kings disposition; but withal to set the Islanders, and every Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty, whereby they said that all the principal Estates of their Country would be weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stir against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Country being so broken, and rent into many small pieces, could neither have disquieted the Persian, by an offensive War, nor made any good defence against him, but would have left it easy for him in continuance of time, to have taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himself Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with Envy, that perceiving how the Dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they chose rather to give all from themselves and others, and make all alike weak, than to permit that any of their own Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalf joynted together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their several Embassadors oppose themselves unto it; and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interposing himself to bring Friends and Foes on the sudden to an equality. Especially Strutarchus, whom Artaxerxes did send as his Lieutenant into the Low-Countries, did seek to repay the harm done by Agessilaus in those parts: which his intent appearing plain, and all hope of the Peace being thereby cut off, Timbro was sent into Asia to make War upon Strutarchus; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the War, being scattered about, all the Isles and Towns on the firm Land grew almost to the manner of Piracy and Robberies; affording many Skirmishes, but few great Actions worthy of Remembrance. Timbro was slain by Strutarchus, and in his place Diphridas was sent, who demeaned himself more warily. Dercyllidas was removed from his charge at Abydos, because he had not impeached Thrasibulus in his enter-enterprises about Hellepont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprized and slain in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasibulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slain by the way at Apollonia; the City of Rhodes having long before joynted with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocracy; or the Government of a few the principal Citizens; whereas contrariwise, the Athenians were accustomed to put the Sovereignty into the hands of the People, each of them seeking to assure themselves, by erecting in the Towns of their Confederates a Government like unto their own: which doing (where more especial cause did not hinder) caused the Nobility to favour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athens. The People of Ægina moved upon the Coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Army in Ægina, and besiege their Town; but this Siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian Fleet, the Islanders began anew to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their Ships again, that returned beaten, having lost four of thirteen. The loss of these Ships was soon recompensed by a Victory which Chabrias the Athenian General had in Ægina; whereupon the Islanders were fain to keep home, and leave to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seem strange that the City of Athens, having but newly raised her Walls, having not by any fortunate and important Battle secured her Estate from dangers by Land; but only depending upon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried unto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause, would send a Fleet and an Army to Cyprus, in defence of Evagoras, when the mastery of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Island lying in the Eye of Persia; had ability to vex the Coast of Attica. But as the over-weening of that City did cause it usually to embrace more than it could compass; so the infidelity and shameless injustice of the People, had now bred in the chief Commanders, a desire to keep themselves far out of sight, and to seek employments at such distance as might secure them from the eyes of the envious, and from public judgments, out of which few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did pass away much part of his time in the Isle of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Taracta, and Chabrias did now carry away into Cyprus a greater Force than his Country well could have spared; with which he returned not when the business in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new Adventures in Ægypt, whereby arose neither thanks to himself, nor profit to his City, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careless of things at hand, had a notable blow given unto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, even within their own Haven. For Telesitas, a Lacedæmonian, being made Governour of Ægina, conceived a strong hope of surprizing the Navy of Athens, as it lay in Piræus; thinking aright, that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten Ships prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in Harbour, whose Mariners were asleep in their Cabins, or drinking in Taverns. Wherefore he failed by Night unto the Mouth of the Port, which entering at the break of day, he found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, and few or none left aboard to make resistance; by which means he took many Ships laden with Merchandizes, many Fisher-men, Passengers, and other Vessels; also three or four Gallies, having sunk or broken, and made unseizable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time, Pharnabazus, the Lieut-

nant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters given to him in Marriage, with whom he lived about the Court; and many Officers that favoured the Lacedæmonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance, the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellepont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not have needed the Peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the Conditions wherof were such as are mentioned before, giving freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and dividing the Country into as many several States as there were petty Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes having bought his own Peace with money, did likewise by his Money become Arbitrator and Decider of Controversies between the Greeks, disposing of their business in such wise as stood left with his own good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his Decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his own; the Isles of Lemnos, Imbros, and Serres be subject to Athens; all other Greek Towns, as well the little as the great, be free at liberty; and that whosoever should refuse this Peace, upon them the approvers of it should make War, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with Men, and Ships, and Treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by revolt of their Confederates, and the necessity of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted Money; and other States, for the miseries of the War, wherof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent unto these Articles. This was called the Peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking upon themselves the execution, did not only compel the Argives to depart out of Corinth (which under pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leave Bœotia free, of which Province Thebes had always held the Government: the Thebans themselves being also comprehended under the name of Bœotians, but caused the Mantineans to throw down their own City, and to dwell in Villages; alleging that they had formerly been accustomed to do so, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as having been ill affected to Sparta in the late War. By these courses the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the small Towns in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their Wars, as Authors of their Liberty; and that the great Cities having lost all their dependants, would be unable to make opposition.

§. X.

The War which the Lacedæmonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by Treason, and Olynthus by Famine.

WHilst these Wars, which ended without either Victory or Profit, consumed the Riches and Power of Greece, the City of Olynthus in Thrace was grown so mighty, that she did not only command her Neighbour-Towns, but was become terrible to places far removed, and to Sparta it self. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principal City of that Kingdom, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the usual pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to set at liberty the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acambus and of Apollonia, being nearest unto the danger of these incroaching Neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians.

ced Lacedæmonians with their fear, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if some continuance of time should give it reputation, which only it wanted; wherefore they requested assistance, but in such terms as did sound of compulsion; protesting that either they must war upon Olynthus, or become subject unto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hasty levy of men, two thousand being presently sent away with promise to be seconded by a greater Army. Whilst these two thousand gave such beginning to the War, as agreed with their small number; the body of the Army following them surprized the Citadel of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hands of Phæbidas, the Lacedæmonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their Faction by the slavery of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the Peace lately made between them; which caused the Lacedæmonians to doubt whether this act of Phæbidas were more worthy of Reward or of Punishment: In conclusion, profit so far over-weighed honesty, that the deed was approved, many principal Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driven into Banishment, and the Traytors rewarded with the Government of the City; by whose Authority, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serve the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This access of power having strengthened the Lacedæmonians, caused them to entertain the greater Forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the loss of one great Battel, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by Famine to render it fall to their obedience.

§. XI.

How the Thebans recovered their Liberty, driving out the Lacedæmonian Garrison.

AFTER this Olynthian War, which endured almost three years, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found means to shake off their Yoke, and gave both example and means to others to do the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, coming to Athens, that the Tyranny wherewith his Country was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for fear of it were fled from home. Whereupon a Plot was laid between these two, that soon found very good success, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men took Athens privately, and entered by Night into the Fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the Evening to the Gates like Husband-men returned from Work, and so passed undiscovered unto the House of Chæron, whom Phylidas the Scribe had drawn into the Conspiracy. The day following, a Solemn Fast being then hold in the City, Phylidas promised the Governours, who were insolent and lustful men, that he would convey unto them that Night the most beautiful Dames of the Town, with whom they should take their pleasure. Having cheered them with such hope, and plenty of good Wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they urged) came, that he could not make good his promise, unless they would dismiss their followers; because the Gentlewomen, who attended without in a Chamber, would not endure, that any of the Servants should see their faces. Upon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maids, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours loose behaviour, slew them all upon the sudden with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their Garments. Then presently casting off their Disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselves to come to the Governours upon business, they got admittance, and slew those which were of the Lacedæmonian Faction. By the like device they brake into the Prison, slew the Gælor, and set at liberty such as they thought meet; and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed Liberty, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captain of the Cattle hearing the Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be stronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practice to discover such, as would be forward upon occasion of revolting. But as soon as day-light revealed the plain truth, all the People took Arms and besieged the Cattle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aid unto the Towns adjoining, whence a few broken Troups coming to the relief, were defeated on the way by the Horse-men of Thebes. On the other side, the banished Thebans did not only make speed to assist their Countrymen, but procured some Athenians to join with them, and thereby came so strong into the City, that the Cattle was yielded more through fear than any necessity, upon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Arms; for which composition the Captain at his return to Sparta was put to death. When the news of the doings at Thebes, and the success arrived at Sparta, an Army was raised forthwith, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recovering of that City, as if some part of their ancient Inheritance had been taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Town perfidiously usurped by them, restored to her own liberty. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition; who having wearied his followers with a toilsome Winter-journey, returned home without any good or harm done; leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Army, at Thebes, to infect the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt upon the Haven of Athens, which falling to take, he wasted the Country adjoining, and drove away Cattel, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the War, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how to withdraw themselves.

CHAP.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing Estate of Thebes, from the Battel of Leuctra to the Battel of Mantinæa.

§. I.

How Thebes and Athens joined together against Sparta. How the Athenians made Peace for themselves and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The Battel of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban Greatness.

THE Lacedæmonians were men of great resolution, and of much gravity in all their proceedings, but one dishonorable rule they held, That all respects withholding the Commixity of Spartans was to be neglected; the practice of which Doctrine, even by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate, but when it was put in execution by insufficient over-weening men, it seldom failed to bring upon them instead of profit unjustly expected, both shame and loss. And so it befel them in these enterprises of Phæbidas, upon the Cattle of Thebes, and Sphodrias upon the Piræus. For howsoever Agefilas did spoil the Country about Thebes, in which he spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good success of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to look abroad, failing to the Isle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and having in some Fights at Sea prevailed, began as in the Peloponnesian War, to surround Peloponnesus with a Navy; afflicting so the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans, by their insolvency wearied their Friends, and caused them to seek for Peace, it had been very likely that the course of this War should have soon come to a good end, which nevertheless, being prosecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day upon her weak Neighbours, not sparing such as had been dependants upon Athens, and finding themselves, whilst engaged in such a War, unable to relieve their complaining Friends, resolved to settle the Affairs of Greece, by renewing that form of Peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the War; to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treaty of Peace, which came to pass, being so wrought by the courageous Wisdom of Epaminondas, who understood far better than his Countrymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treaty the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did soon agree; but when the Thebans offered to swear to the Articles in the name of the Beotians, Agefilas required them to swear in their own Name, and to leave the Beotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their Obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the City of Sparta should give example to Thebes, by setting the Lacæmonians free; for that the Signory of Beotia did by as good right appertain to the The- bans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agefilas bearing a vehement hatred unto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawn back out of Asia into Greece, and disappointed of all the Glory which he had hoped to achieve by the Persian War, did now very passionately urge that Point of setting the Beotians at liberty, and finding it as obstinately refused, he dashed the Name of the Thebans out of the League. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocia, who received command from the Governours of Sparta forthwith to enter upon the Land of the Thebans with all his Power, which he did, and was there slain at Leuctra, and with him the Flower of his Army. This Battel of Leuctra being one of the most famous that ever were fought between the Greeks, was not so notable for any Circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the Fight it self, as for the Death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this Battel (between which and the conclusion of the general Peace, there passed but twenty days) the Lacedæmonians were never able to recover the Strength and Reputation which had formerly made them redoubted far and near; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest Ambition had in former times confined it self unto the little Region of Beotia, did now begin to undertake the Leading and Command of many People and Estates, in such wise, that soon after they brought an Army of three score and ten thousand strong unto the Gates of Sparta. So much do the Afflictions of an hard War valiantly endured, advance the Affairs of the distressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which Wealth and Ease had through Luxury, Recklessness, and many other Vices or Vanities, made rusty and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians took upon them to maintain the Peace of Greece. New Troubles hence arising. Epaminondas invadeth and wasteth the Territory of Lacedæmon.

THE Athenians refusing to take advantage of this Overthrow fallen upon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians; did nevertheless finally give them to understand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their Pride might well be laid away. For, taking upon themselves the maintenance of the Peace lately concluded, which Agefilas (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of Quarrels that might arise) had left unperforated, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the general Liberty of all Towns, as well small as great, was ratified, under the Seals of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began forth Garbolls. The Marineans claiming power by this Decree to order their Affairs at their own Pleasure, did (as it were) in despite of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their Town, readjust it, and ally themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with Factions; some desiring to hold good correspondence with the Lacedæmonians; some to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durst not give Impeachment to the Marineans; nor take upon them to correct their Ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the Factions broke out into violence, and each party called in foreign help. Then was an Army sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the People of Tegæa, against the Marineans, but it indeed against them both. Agesslaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrisians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; with the Power of which Countreys, they entred Peloponnesus in favour of the Arcadians, who had upon expectation of their coming, abstained from giving Battel to Agesslaus. The Army of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaninondas joyned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found belief if any had foretold it. Almost six hundred years were spent, since the Dorians, under the Posterity of Hercules, had seized upon Laconia, in all which time, the found of an Enemies Trumpet was not heard in that Country: Ten years were not fully past since all Greece was at the Devotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Army could once look upon, nor the mighty Forces of Athenians, and other Enemy-States had dared to set foot on, saving by stealth, was all on a light Fire, the very Smoak whereof the Women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignity notwithstanding, the Lacedæmonians did not stir out of Sparta to fight, but fought how to preserve the Town, sitting at liberty as many of their Hillites or Slaves, as were willing to bear Arms in defence of the State, and somewhat pitifully entreated the Athenians to give them succour. From Corinth and some Towns of Peloponnesus they received speedy assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaninondas returned without Battel, having rebuilded the City of Messene, and peopled it anew by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedæmonians many Ages before had chased away into other Countreys, possessing their Territories themselves.

§. III.

The Composition between Athens and Sparta for common Misfortune, considering that, without their Aid, the Success of all Enterprizes proved to ill; whereas they themselves had by their own power accomplished very well whatsoever they took in hand, and were become not only victorious over the Lacedæmonians, but Patrons over the Thebans, and Moderators of the great Quarrels that had risen in Macedonia, where compounding the Differences about that Kingdom, as pleased them

His Journey therefore utterly defaced the Reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the Conduct of the Army which was to be raised, nor any manner of Precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held League with it, unto Athenians, they offered to yield the Admiralty to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generals by Land. This had been a Composition well agreeing with the situation and quality of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no mark or estimation, in regard of those Companies of Horses and Foot whereof the Land-Army was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athenians, were to have served under the Lacedæmonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authority should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five days, the Lacedæmonians other five, and so successively that each of them should have Command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vain Ambition was more regarded than the common Profit, which must of necessity be very slowly advanced, where Consultation, Resolution, and Performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second Invasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their Enemies so unable to impeach them, that having fortified Isthmus from Sparta to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their Strength by Epaninondas, who foraged the Country without resistance. But as the Articles of this League between Athenians and Sparta did, by dividing the Conduct in such manner, disable the Society, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the Enemies Heads with the like Vanity. For the Arcadians considering their own numbers which they brought into the Field, and having found by many trials that their People were not inferior to others in strength of body, in Courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the Government with their Friends the Thebans; and not always continue Followers of others, by encroaching upon their Greatness, they should strengthen their own Yoke. Hereupon they began to demean themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hateful to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a morion of general Peace having been made (which took not effect, because the City of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedæmonians) the next enterprize of the Spartans and their Friends was upon these Arcadians, who relying too much upon their own Worth, were overthrown in a great Battel, their Calamity being as pleasing to their Confederates as to their Enemies.

§. IV.

The great Growth of the Theban Estate. Embassadors of the Greeks to the Persians; with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitless issue of the Embassadors.

The Thebans especially rejoiced at the Arcadians Misfortune, considering that, without their Aid, the Success of all Enterprizes proved to ill; whereas they themselves had by their own power accomplished very well whatsoever they took in hand, and were become not only victorious over the Lacedæmonians, but Patrons over the Thebans, and Moderators of the great Quarrels that had risen in Macedonia, where compounding the Differences about that Kingdom, as pleased them them best, they carried Philip the Son of Antimachus, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage unto Thebes, having therefore obtained such reputation that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought means of Alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadors the great and famous Captain Pelopidas, whose Reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two special points were, That Messene should remain free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their Ships of War to Sea; only the later of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further advice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadors at the same time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the King having found by long experience, how far it concerned him to maintain a sure Party in Greece, did upon many weighty considerations resolve to bind the Thebans firmly unto him; justly expecting, that their Greatness should be on that side his own security. The Athenians had been ancient Enemies to his Crown, and, having turned the Profit of their Victories upon the Persians, to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signory in such puissant manner, that (sundry grievous Misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible War, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with Treasure and all sorts of Aid by Darius Nabzus, were not able to vanquish them, till their own indifferency brought them on their Knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious over Athenians, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertook the Conquest of Asia, from which, though by the Commotion raised in Greece with Persian Gold, they were called back, yet having renewed their Power, and settled things in Greece, it was not unlikely that they should upon the next advantage have pursued the same Enterprize, had not they been impeached by this Theban War. But the Thebans contrariwise had always discovered a good affection to the Crown of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his Invasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedæmonians against Athenians; and finally, having offered much contumely to Agesslaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making War on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deservings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore unlikely to look abroad, whereunto if perchance they should have any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good Haven Towns, which they could not seize upon without open breach of that Peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving liberty to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend unto the requests of Pelopidas, as far forth as he might without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and thereby means he purchased his own quiet, being never afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill means which the Greeks had to disturb Artaxerxes, was very beneficial to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great Rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the Affairs of Greece been so composed, that any one City might without impeachment of the rest have transported an Army to assist the revolting Satrapes, or Viceroy of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia, humane reason can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preserved from that ruins, which the Divine Council had deferred unto the days of Alexander. But this great Conspiracy of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting a firm Body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space diffused and vanished like a Mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiatics wearied quickly with the Travels and dangers incident to War, forsaking the common Cause, and each man striving to be the first that by Treason to his Company should both redeem the former Treason to his Prince, and purchase with all his own promotion with increase of Riches. Of this Commotion, which in course of time followed some actions, not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; both for that it was like a sudden storm, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly laid down, having made a great noise without effect, and having little reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole Reign of Artaxerxes, from the War of Cyrus, to the Invasion of Ægyptus, I find nothing (this Infurrection, and a fruitless Journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention, much less of digression from the course of the business in Greece. All, or the most of his time, passed away so quietly, that he enjoyed the Pleasures which an Empire to great and wealthy could afford unto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The Troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domestical; growing out of the hatred which Parjais the Queen-Mother bare unto his Wife Staira, and to such as had been the greatest Enemies to her Son Cyrus, or gloried in his Death: upon whom, when by poison and mischievous practices she had fastened her feminine Appetite of Revenge, thenceforth the wholly applied her self to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the leud desire of marrying his own Daughter, and filling him with the Persuasion, which Princess not ended with an especial grace do readily entertain, That his own Will was the supreme Law of his Subject, and the rule by which all things were to be measured, and adjudged to be good or evil. In this imaginary happiness Pelopidas, and the other Embassadors of Greece, both found and left him, but left him by so much more assured that they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treaty with them, being altogether to his own advantage, did seem to promise, if not the perpetuity, a long endurance of the same Felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternity laid by mortal men in this transitory World, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from Heaven, or made vain and unprofitable ere the Frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of Tongues among the Builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadors to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Towns, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common Peace, who thereby should become the Judges of all Controversies that might arise, and Leaders in War of all that would enter into this Confederacy, the Kings Letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadors, drawn thither from all parts of Greece; when an Oath was required for observance of the term of Peace therein set down, a dilatory answer was made by the Embassadors, who said that they were sent to hear the Articles; not to swear unto them. Hereby the the Thebans were driven to fend unto each of the Cities to require the Oath; but in vain. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, That they did not need it; others took courage by their example to do the like, disapproving the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this Negotiation with Arceades gave neither addition nor confirmation of greatness, but left them as it found them to rely upon their own Swords.

§. V.

How all Greece was divided, between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great Tumults rising in Arcadia.

THE condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each upon envy of the others greatness, drawn all her followers into a cruel intestine War, by which the whole Country, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoin their Forces against the Thebans, who fought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Acadians, followed the party of these ancient governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received; or in dislike of those who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which Authority they could not suddenly ascribe without some injury and much envy. The City of Thebes abounding with men whom necessity had made Warrilike, and many Victories in few years had filled with great spirits, and being for mighty in dependants, that she had reduced all the Continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Asia, and very little part beside excepted) under such acknowledgments, as wanted not much of meer Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already she had set good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had been always bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobility Superior; but were far under them in Valour, having been often beaten out of the Field by them, and put in danger of losing all; which caused them to suspect and envy nothing more than the greatness and honour of Sparta; taking Truce with her when she was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them; but firmly joining with her Enemies whenever they found her entangled in a difficult War. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, sure Friends of Thebes, so the Acadians, transported with a great opinion of their own Worthiness, had formerly renounced and provoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtful adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought convenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to send an Army into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wavering Friends should fall further off, and become either Neutral, or which was to be feared, open Enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made Peace with Athens; which was very strange, and seemed no less to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firm League with Sparta at the same time when the Acadians treated with them, did nevertheless accept this new Confederacy, not relinquishing the old, because they found that, howsoever these Acadians were Enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they should hereby be drawn somewhat further from their Alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponnesus with a strong Army. But this did rather hasten, than by any means stay, the coming of Epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more clear for him (because the City of Corinth, which lay upon the Isthmus, and had been adverse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grievous War, driven to become Neutral) took occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Acadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Army, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great Tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated Money, which many principal men among them had laid hands on, under pretence of employing it to publick uses. In compounding the differences grown upon this occasion, such as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captain of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegæ, to take Prisoners many of their Country-men, as People desirous of innovation. This was done: but the uproar thereby caused was so great, that the Prisoners were forthwith enlarged, and the Acadians, who had in great numbers taken Arms, with much ado scarce pacified. When complaint of the Captains proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame upon them who had made the Peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to judge of their Fidelity, by the assistance which they should give him in that War which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Acadians; who needing not the aid of so mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before fought means to settle the Affairs of their Country, by drawing things to some good conclusion of Peace, did now forthwith send to Athens for help; and which dispatched some of the principal among them as Embassadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now ready to be invaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedæmonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew that all their Forces, and best Provisions, would be no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about Privileges, they (who had been accustomed unto such a Supremacy, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerful City of Athens, till other hope of securing their own Estate could not be thought upon) did now very gently yield to the Acadians, that the command of the Army in chief, should be given, for the time, to that City, in whose Territory it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible Invasion of Peloponnesus by Epaminondas.

Certain it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firm consent, and uniform care of the common safety. For beside the great Forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Messenians, prepared with all their strength to join with Epaminondas; who having lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, received there intelligence, that the Army coming coming from Athens would pass by Sea; whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegæ, which City, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be upon such of the Acadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedæmonian Captains to fortify Mantineæ with all diligence, and to send for Agelæus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men, which remained in the Town, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas; but Epaminondas held so good opinion upon these Enemies, that had not an unknown Fellow brought hasty advertisement of his purpose to Agelæus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantineæ, the City of Sparta had suddenly been taken. For thither with all speed and secrecy did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the City, notwithstanding any defence that could have been made by that handful of men remaining within it; but that Agelæus in all flying haste got into it with his Companies, whom the Army of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arrival of the Lacedæmonians and their Friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a fair advantage upon Mantineæ. It was the time of Harvest, which made it very likely that the Mantineans, finding the War to be carried from their Walls into another quarter, would use the commodity of that vacation, by fetching in their Corn, and turning out their Cattel into their Fields, whilst no Enemy was near that might impeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantineæ, sending his Horse-men before him, to seize upon all that might be found within the City. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the Country; far more intent upon their Harvest-busines, than upon the War, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattel, being unable to recover the Town, were in a desperate case; and the Town it self in no great likelihood of holding out, when the Enemy should have taken all their Provision of Victuals with so many of the People, as had not over-dearly been redeemed, by that Cities returning to Society with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians coming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantineæ, were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their Goods, and People, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any courageous Adventure to deliver those who otherwife were given as lost. The Thebans were known at that time to be the best Souldiers of all the Greeks; and the commendation of good Horse-man-ship had always been given to the Thebians, as excelling in that quality all other Nations; yet the regard of Honour so wrought upon the Athenians, that for the Reputation of their City, which had entred into this War, upon no necessity of her own, but only in desire of relieving her distressed Friends, they issued forth of Mantineæ, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their Horses with meat; and giving a lusty charge upon the Enemy, who as bravely received them, after a long and hot Fight, they remained Masters of the Field, giving by this Victory a safe and easy retreat to all that were without the Walls. The whole power of the Boetians arrived in the place soon after this Battel, whom the Lacedæmonians and their Assistants were not far behind.

§. VII.

The great Battel of Mantinea. The honourable death of Epaminondas, with his commendation.

Epaminondas, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprizing Sparta and Mantineæ having failed, the impression of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soon vanish, unless by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leave some memorable Character of his Expedition; resolved to give them Battel, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtful affections of his own Associates, and to leave the Spartans as weak in spirit and ability as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that Battel, where in Victory should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacrity of his Souldiers to be such, as promised the accomplishment of his own desire; he made shew of declining the Enemy, and intrenching himself in a place of more advantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heat of their Valour, and afterwards strike their Senses with amazement, when he should come upon them unexpected. This Opinion deceived him not: For with very much tumult, as in so great and sudden a danger, the Enemy ran to Arms, necessity enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that days service urging them to do as well as they might. The Theban Army consisted of thirty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse; the Lacedæmonians and their Friends were short of this number, both in Horse and in Foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the War was in their Country) stood in the right Wing, and with them the Lacedæmonians: the Athenians had the left Wing, the Acheans, Eleans, and others of less account, filled the body of the Army. The Thebans stood in the left Wing of their own Battel, opposite to the Lacedæmonians, having by them the Acadians; the Eubæans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thebians with others, compounding the main Battel; the Argives held the right Wing, the Horse-men on each part were placed in the flanks, only a Troup of the Eleans were in rear. Before the foot-men could joyn, the encounter of the Horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yielding to the Enemy either in courage or skill, were over-laid with numbers, and so beaten upon by Thebians slings, that they were driven to forsake the place, and leave their Infantry naked. But this retreat was the less disgraceful, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall back upon their own foot-men; but finding the Theban Horse to have given them over, and which discovering some Companies of Foot, which had been sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their Battel in the Rear, they brake upon them, routed them, and hewed them all in pieces. In the mean season the Battel of the Athenians had not only to do with the Argives, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horse-men, in such wise that it began to open, and was ready to turn back, when the Elean Squadron of Horse came up to the relief of it, and restored all on that part. With far greater violence did the Lacedæmonians and Thebans meet, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient Honour;

Honour; so that equal courage and equal loss on both sides made the hope & appearance of Victory to either equally doubtful; unless perhaps the Lacedæmonians being very firm abiders, might seem the more likely to prevail, as having both the first brunt and fury of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excel in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few years, cannot be thought to have gotten a habit so sure and general.

But Epinomondas perceiving the obstinate stiffness of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad success of their own Horse, nor all the Force of the Boeotian Army, could abate so far, as to make them give one foot of ground; taking a choice Company of the most able men, whom he cast into the form of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his own exceeding virtue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their Ranks, and cleave the whole Battle in despite of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may justly be said to have carried the Victory, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the Battle was fought, having driven the Enemy to lodge farther off. For that which was alleged by the Athenians, as a token that the Victory was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their own flight, finding them behind their Army, and the retaining of their dead Bodies; it was a Ceremony regardable only among the Greeks, and served merely for ostentation, shewing that by the Fight they had obtained somewhat, which the Enemy could not get from them otherwise than by request.

But the Thebans arrived at the general immediate end of Battle; none daring to abide them in the Field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for trial of their ability and prowess. This was the last work of the incomparable virtue of Epinomondas, who being in the head of that Warlike Troop of men, which broke the Lacedæmonian Squadron, and forced it to give back in difarray, was furiously charged on the sudden by a desperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, he nevertheless with a singular courage maintained the Fight, using against the Enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his own Body; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he received so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the Iron and a piece of the tranchion in his breast. Hereupon he sunk down, and was soon conveyed out of the Fight by his Friends; having by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who vain would have got his Body) but much more inflamed with revengeful indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heavy mischance, did with great slaughter compel their disordered Enemies to leave the Field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the sadness of this disaster, than with all the travel of the day. Epinomondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Physicians, That when the head of the Dart should be drawn out of his Body, he must needs die. Hearing this, he called for his Shield, which to have lost was held a great dishonour: It was brought unto him. He had them tell him which part had the Victory; answer was made, that the Boeotians had won the Field. Then said he, it is fair time for me to die; and wishal sent for Isidrus and Dio- phanes, two principal Men of War, that were both slain; which being told him, he advised the Thebans to make Peace, whil实现 with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the Office of a General. Herewithal he willed that the head of the weapon should be drawn out of his Body; comforting his Friends that lamented his death, and want of life, by telling them that the Victories of Leidas and Mantineas were two fair Daughters, in whom his memory should live.

So did Epinomondas, the worthiest Man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Country: for he equalled all others in the several virtues, which in each of them were singular. His Justice, and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wisdom, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferior to his Military Virtue; in every part whereof he so excelled, that he could not properly be called a Warrior, a Valiant, a Politick, a Bountiful or an Industrious, and a Provident Captain; all these Titles, and many other, being due unto him, which with his notable Discipline, and good Conduct, made a perfect composition of an Heroick General. Neither was his private Conversation unamiable to those high parts, which gave him praise abroad. For he was Grave, and yet very Affable and Courteous; resolute in Publick business, but in his own particular ease, and of much mildness; a lover of his People, bearing with mens Infirmities, witty and pleasant in speech, far from insolence, Master of his own Affections, and furnished with all qualities that might win and keep love. To these Graces were added great ability of Body, much Eloquence, and very deep knowledge in all parts of Philosophy and Learning, wherewith his mind being enlightened, rested not in the sweetness of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gave unto Thebes, which had evermore been an underling, a dreadful reputation among all People adjoining, and the highest Command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the Peace concluded in Greece after the Battle of Mantineas. The Voyage of Agessilaus into Egypt. His death and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made between him and Pompey the Roman.

THE Battle of Mantineas was the greatest that ever had been fought in that Country between the Neutrals; and the last. For at Mareton and Plataea, the populous Armies of the Barbarous Nations gave rather a great fame, than a hard trial to the Græcians Valour; neither were the practice of Arms and Art Military so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian War, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were undertaken against foreign Enemies, proving for the most part unfortunate. But in this last Fight all Greece was interested, which never had more able Soldiers, and brave Commanders, nor ever contended for Victory with greater care of the success, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding, the issue being such as hath been related, it was found best for every particular Estate, that a general Peace should be established, every one retaining what he presently had, and none being forced to depend upon another. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new League,

League, which caused the Lacedæmonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindered not the rest from proceeding to conclusion; considering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to show that anger in Ceremonies, which had no power that it could in execution. This Peace, as it gave some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athen and Sparta it afforded leisure to seek after Wealth by foreign employment in Egypt, whither Agessilaus was sent with some small Forces to assist, or indeed, as a Mercenary, to serve under Tachis King of Egypt in his War upon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acis King of Egypt, went now as a Voluntary, with such Forces as he could raise by entreaty, and offer of good pay, to the same service. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amphicrates of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Notus, having retained the Country notwithstanding all intestine Diffentions, and foreign Invasions, during three Generations of their own race, were so well acquainted with the Valour of the Greeks, that by their help (easily procured with Gold) they conceived great hope, not only to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoining, which were held by the Persians. What the issue of this great enterprise might have been, had it not fallen by Domestical Rebellion, it is uncertain. But very likely it is that the Rebellion it self had soon come to nothing, if Agessilaus had not proved a false Traytor, joyning with Neëanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebel with that Army which the money of Tachis had waged. This falsehood Agessilaus excused, as tending to the good of his own Country; though it seem rather, that he grudged because the King took upon himself the Conduct of the Army, using his service only as Lieutenant, who had made full account of being appointed the General. Howsoever it came to pass, Tachis being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chief confidence, fled unto the Persians, who upon his submission gave him gentle entertainment; and Neëanebus (who seems to have been the Nephew of Tachis) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set up another King, to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Agessilaus fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed so far, that he left Neëanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdom; who in recompence of his Treason to the former King Tachis, and good Service done to himself, rewarded him with two hundred and thirty Talents of Silver, with which booty sailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate and valiant, and a good Leader in War; free from Covetousness, and not reproached with any blame of Lust; which qualities are the less admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endure every one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent stream of an ill nature) with all, or the chief, of these good qualities. He was nevertheless very arrogant, perverse, unjust, and vain glorious, measuring all things by his own will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses whose ends were beyond hope. The Expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be overthrown; with which conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans, and their Allies, he did ever after bear such hatred unto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meer necessity to grow Warlike, and able, to the utter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable loss of all her former greatness. The commendations given to him by Xenophon his good Friend, have caused Plutarch to lay his name in the balance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the solemn gravity of carriage excepted) are very disproportionate. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great Wars under sundry Climates, and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of Employments all that were before him; so Agessilaus had at one time or other some Quarrel with every Town in Greece; had made a War in Asia, and meddled in the business of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessors: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large Wages, which Pompey never took. Herein also they are very like; each of them was the last great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of Liberty, and each of them ruined the liberty of his Country by his own Lordly wilfulness. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; The resemblance was nearer than the equality. Indeed the freedom of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæsar, whom he had enforced to take Arms; yet the Roman Empire stood, the form of Government only being changed: But the Liberty of Greece, or of Sparta it self, was not forced into a victorious War; yet the Signory, and ancient Renown of Sparta was presently lost: and the freedom of all Greece being wounded in this Theban War, and after much Blood lost, ill healed by the Peace ensuing, did very soon upon the death of Agessilaus give up the Ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Country was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the contemporary passages of things, in any other Nation.

Intreating of the Times from the Reign of PHILIP of MACEDON, to the establishing of that Kingdom in the Race of ANTIGONUS.

The FOURTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip, the Father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

THE Greeks, of whom we have already made large Discourse, not as yet wearied with intestine War, nor made wife by their vain Contention for Superiority, do still, as in former times, continue the Invasion and Vastation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their Liberty with as happy success as ever Nation had, and with no less Honour, than hath ever been acquired by deeds of Arms. And having had a tryal, and experience, more than fortunate, against those Nations they so little regarded what might come from them, who had so often forfeited the Reputation of their Forces, as whatsoever could be spared from their own distraction at home, they transported over the Hellispon, as sufficient to entertain and buse them withal.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of mark in the World, that they under-fall and perish by the hands and harms which they least fear; so fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speak) they they had to little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the fast growing greatness of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their own safety, have served them for a strong argument of union and accord. But the glory of their Persian Victories, wherewith they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the Power and Purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which fate nearer than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakened them, and won upon them, that they were not (as the Grecians perfwaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover their own, much less to work any Wonders against their Borders. And indeed it was not in their Philosophy to consider, That all great alterations are storm-like, sudden and violent; and that it is then over-late to repair the decayed and broken Banks, when great Rivers are once swollen, fast running, and iraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselves, in breaking down those Defences which stood between them and this Inundation, than seek to rampare and re-nforce their own Fields, which by the Level of reason they might have found to have lain under it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius: Greciae Civitates dum imperio singula capunt, imperium omnes perdidit; The Cities of Greece lost their Commons, by striving each of them to command all.

The Kingdom of Macedon, is called of Macedon, the Son of Ophi, or, as other Authors affirm, of Jupiter and Astraea, is the next Region towards the North, which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Aegean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west, by Thessaly and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the Family of Temenus, of the Race of Hercules, and by Nation Argives; who are listed as followeth. About some six years after the Transilation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colony into Macedon, departed thence with many People; and as he was marching through that Country, the Weather being rainy and tempestuous, he espied a great Heard of Goats, which fled the Storm as fast as they could, hasting them to their known place of covert. Whereupon Caranus calling to mind, that he had also by an other Oracle been directed to follow the first Troop of those Beasts, that should either lead him or fly before him; he pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edessa, and being undiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darkness of the Air, he entered their City without resistance, and possessed it. Soon after this, by the overthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twenty years. Carus succeeded Caranus; and reigned twelve years. Tyrmas followed Carus, and ruled eight and twenty years.

Perdiccas the first, the son of Tyrmas, governed one and fifty years: a Prince, for his great Valour, and many other Vertues, much renowned. Soliman, Pliny, Justin, Eusebius, Theophrastus, Antiochus, and others affirm, that he appointed a place of Burial for himself, and; for all the Kings of Macedon his Successors, at Aegae; assuring them that the Kingdom should so long continue in his Line and Race, as they continued to lay up their Bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the Polarity of the Temenidae failed in him: a thing rather deviated after the effect, as I conceive, than foretold by Perdiccas.

Argus succeeded unto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twenty years.

Philip the first, his Successor, reigned eight and twenty years.

Eurydice followed Philip, and governed six and twenty years: in whose Infancy the Illyrians invaded Macedon, and having obtained a great Victory, they purified the fame to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians gathering new Forces, and resolving either to recover their former Loss, or to lose at once both their Kingdom and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the Field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten (their King present) or rather they perfwaded themselves that there was no man so void of Honour and Compassion, as to abandon their natural Lord, being an Infant, and no way (but by the hands of his Servants) able to defend himself from destruction.

The like is reported by Aiminus, of Cleotarus the Son of Fredigunda.

Aleetas succeeded Eurydice, and ruled nine and twenty years.

Amyntas the first succeeded Aleetas, and reigned fifty years; he lived at such time as Darius Hyaspes, after his unprosperous return out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Army into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yielding unto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you have heard before, were, for their insolent Behaviour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slain by the direction of Alexander, who was the Son of Amyntas, and his Successor.

Alexander, furnished the Rich, the Son of Amyntas, governed Macedon three and forty years. He did not only appease the Wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadors, by giving Gyges his Sister, to Babarus of the Blood of Persia, but by that Match he grew so great in Xerxes Grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be united to the Kingdom of Macedon. Yet could not these Benefits buy his Affection from the Greeks. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made General of the Persian Army; he, Alexander, acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three Sons, Perdiccas, Aleetas, and Philip.

Perdiccas the second, the Son of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian War, and reigned in all eight and twenty years. The Wars which he made were not much remarkable: the Story of them is found here and there by pieces, in Theophrastus his first six Books. He left behind him two Sons; Perdiccas, who was very young, and Archelaus, who was bafe born.

Perdiccas the third, being delivered to the custody and care of Archelaus, was at seven years of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Grandmother, who executing this Rage to Cleopatra the Mother of the young King, said, That the Child in following a Goose had lost, fell thereby by misadventure.

But Archelaus, being not here: for having thus dispatched his Brother, he flew both his Uncle Aleetas, the Son of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the Son of Aleetas, his Cousin German, and enjoyed the Kingdom of Macedon himself four and twenty years.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himself King by wicked Murder, yet he performed many things greatly greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he fought by all means to draw Socrates unto him, and that he greatly loved and honoured Euripides the Tragedian. He had two Sons, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father, and having reigned seven years, he was slain in hunting, either by chance or of purpose, by Crataeus.

Orestes his younger Son was committed to the Education of Eropus, of the Royal Blood of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupil; for Eropus murdered him and usurped the Kingdom, which he held some six years: the same who denied passage to Agislaus King of Sparta, who desired after his return from the Asian Expedition, to pass by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This Uliurper left three Sons, Pausanias, Argaeus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his Father Eropus, and having reigned one year, he was driven out by Amyntas the Son of Philip, the Son of the first Perdiccas, the Son of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preserved, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his Brother Perdiccas, his Uncle Aleetas and his Son Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very unquietly) four and twenty years; for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians; and by his Brother Argaeus; incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argaeus, for two years dispossessed of Macedon: but also on the other side, the Olympians, his Neighbours near the Aegean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chief City of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his Wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three Sons; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Eurydice or Exione: he had also by his second Wife Gyges, three Sons; Archelaus, Argaeus, and Menelaus, afterward slain by their Brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Ptolemy, surnamed Alerteis, of the City Alos, wherein he was born.

Alexander the second reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Pausanias, the Son of Eropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great sum of Money) to leave his youngest Brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his Father Amyntas to the Payment of Tribute. After this, Alexander being injured by the Aleoade against Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Thessaly, having redeemed his Brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his assistance entered into Confederacy with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Country, with whom he also left Philip, with divers other principal persons for the Gage of his Promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in love with her Son-in-law, who had married her Daughter Eurydice or Exione, practiced the Death of Alexander her Son, with a purpose to confer the Kingdom on her Paramour, which Ptolemy Alerteis did put in execution: by means whereof he held Macedon for three years, but was soon after slain by Perdiccas the Brother of Alexander. Diodorus hath it otherwise of Philip being made Pledge; and faith, That Amyntas his Father delivered him for Hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conveyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his Father was yet living) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and delivered for Hostage a second time by Alexander his Brother.

Perdiccas the third, after he had slain Alerteis his bafe Brother, governed Macedon five years, and was then slain in a Battle against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Justin affirmeth, that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did.

The beginning of Philips Reign, and how he delivered Macedon from the Troubles wherein he found it entangled.

Philip the second, the youngest Son of Amyntas by Eurydice, having been instructed in all knowledge requisite unto the Government of a Kingdom, in that excellent Education which he had under Epaminondas, making an escape from Diod. l. 16. Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first year of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourcore and thirteen years: and finding the many Enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdom was invironed, he took on him, not as King (for Perdiccas left a Son, though but an Infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the Men of War. Yet his fruitless Ambition soon overgrew his Modesty, and he was easily perfwaded by the People to accept both the Title of King, and withal the absolute Rule of the Kingdom.

And to say the truth, The necessity of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set up in opposition Pausanias; the Athenians, Argaeus; Sons of the late Uliurper Eropus: each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their own Election. These heavy Burthens when Philip could not well bear, he bought of the weightiest by Money, and by fair Promises unloaded himself of so many of the rest, as he ran under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his Brother Perdiccas had his Death accompanied with four thousand Macedonians, beside these that were wounded and taken Prisoners; and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land under Mentias, did beat upon him on all sides and quarters of his Country: Yet after he had practiced the Men of War of Pannonia; and corrupted them with Gifts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest Enemies; and, for the first, he prevented their recovery of Amphipolis, a City on the Frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue Argaeus the Son of Eropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heels in his Retreat from Aegae, that he forced him to abide the Battle: which Argaeus lost, having the greater part of his Army slain in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remained unbroken, took the advantage of a strong piece of Ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoiding thereby the present Fury of the Souldiers, they obtained of the Vanquishers Life and Liberty to return into Attica. Whereupon a Peace was concluded between him and the Athenians for that present, and for this Clemency he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greeks.

The good Success which Philip had in many Enterprises.

NOW had Philip leisure to look Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Peonians, his irreconcilable Enemies and Borderers: both which he invaded with so prosperous success, as he flew Euridias, King of the Illyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon; and withal, upon the Death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc'd that Country, and after a main Victory obtained, he enforc'd them to pay him Tribute. This was no sooner done, than (with-out staying to take longer breath) he hasten'd speedily towards Larissa, upon the River Peneus in Thessaly, of which Town he soon made himself Master; and thereby he got good footing in that Country; whereof he made use in time following. Now although he resolv'd either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his own against all others, because the Horse-men of that Country were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safety to close up the entrances out of Thrace, lest while he invaded Thessaly and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or overrun Macedon as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, situate on the famous River of Strymon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and won it. He also recovered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (sometimes Datus) and called it after his own Name Philippi: to the People whereof St. Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in Mines of Gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philippi Affairs, he drew yearly a thousand Talents, which make fix hundred thousand French Crowns.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian Shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entered into League with his Fathers malicious Enemies the Olympians; whom the better to fasten unto him, he gave them the City of Pydna with the Territory, meaning nothing less than that they should enjoy it, or their own Estate many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground upon the Greeks, he took the fair occasion to deliver the City of Pheres in Thessaly, from the Tyranny of Lycophron and Isipponus. Who, after they had conspired with Ibabe the Wife of Alexander, who usurped upon the Liberty of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former Liberty. Which act of Philip did for ever after fasten the Thessalians unto him, and, to his exceeding great advantage, bind them to his Service.

§. IV.

Of the Phocian War, which first drew Philip into Greece.

ABOUT this time, to wit, in the second year of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight years after the Battle of Mantineæ, and about the eighth year of Antioxerus Ochus, began that War, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concur towards the execution of eternal Providence, and of every great alteration in the World there is some preceeding preparation, though not at the first easily discern'd; so did this revengeful hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with half a hand wrest the Sword out of their fingers; but the Greeks themselves beating down their own Defences, to give him an easy passage, and beating themselves, to give him Victory without peril, left nothing unperformed towards their own Slavery, saving the Title and Impiety. Of this War the Thebans (made over-proud by their Victory at Leuctra) were the Inflamers. For at the Council of the Amphyctyones, or of the general Estates of Greece, in which, at that time, they swayed most, they caus'd both the Lacedæmonians and Phocians to be condemn'd in greater Sums of Money than they could well bear; the one for surpassing the Cattle of Cadmea in the time of Peace, the other for plunging up a piece of Ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolv'd not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and encouraged by the Lacedæmonians; and for refusal were exposted as Sacrilegious, and accus'd to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawful to invade and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perfwaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captain of their own, call the same Dicta of Hazard that Cæsar after many Ages following did; but had not the same Chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the Enemies of their own Nation. And the better to bear out an ungracious Quarrel, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolv'd to sack the Temple of Apollis Ground; they had so much offended of Apollis Ground; and their Neighbour-Nations, as would could not befall them than already was intended; they resolv'd to take the Gold with the Ground, and either to perish for all, or to prevail against all that had communion to call them to account. The Treasure which they took out of the Temple in the beginning of the War was ten thousand Talents, which in those days serv'd them to wage a great many men, and such was their success in the beginning of the War, as they won three great Battels against the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus call himself headlong over the Rocks.

In the mean while the Cities of Cheroneia, both to defend themselves against their bad Neighbour Philip, who encroached upon them, and to draw others into their Quarrel, rendred themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepar'd to get them into his hands, and at the Siege of Metone lost one of his Eyes. It is said, That he that shot him did purposely direct his Arrow towards him, and that it was written on the Shaft thereof: After plan. Vlt. Philippo, After to Philip; for so he was called. an. Strab. that gave him the Wound. This City he even'd 1. 2. with the Soil.

The

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thessalians engag'd in the Holy War, entred Thessaly with new Forces, being assisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Army, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hop'd so to entertain the Thessalians at home, as they should not find leisure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time call'd into Thessaly; but both the Thessalians and Macedonians (Philip being present) were utterly overthrown by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Thessaly, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Boeotia, and with the same victorious Army brake the Forces of the Boeotians, and took from them their City of Coronea. But Philip, impatient of his late misadventure, after he had re-enforc'd his Army, returned with all speed into Thessaly, there to find again the Honour which he lately lost: and was the second time encountered by Onomarchus, who brought into the Field twenty thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. All this great preparation suffic'd not; for Onomarchus was by Philip furore, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Army overrun, six thousand slain, and three thousand taken; of which number, himself being one, was among others hang'd by Philip. Those that fled were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which sail'd along the Coast, commanded by Chares; but the greatest number of those that took the Sea, were therein devour'd as they recovered them. Lycophron was now again driven out of Thessaly, and Pheres made free as before.

§. V.

Of the Olynthian War. The ambitious practices of Philip.

FROM hence Philip resolv'd to invade Phocia itself, but the Athenians did not favour his entrance into those parts; and therefore with the help of the Lacedæmonians they retrench his passage at the Streights of Thermopylae. Whereupon he return'd into Macedon, and after the taking of Micytherne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrell'd with the Olympians, whom not long before he had woo'd to his Alliance, and bought his Peace of them. For the Olympians were very strong, and had evermore both brav'd and beaten the Macedonians. It is said, that Philip having put to death Archeblaus his half-brother (for Amintas had three Sons by Euridice the Mother of Philip, and three other Sons by Gygæa: but Philip's elder Brothers by the same Mother being dead, he determin'd to rid himself also of the rest) the two younger held themselves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olympians was the cause of the War, Justin affirmeth. But just Quarrels are balanced by just Princes; for to this King all things were lawful that might any way serve his turn; all his affections and passions, how divers soever in other men, were in his ambition swallowed up, and thereto converted. For he neither forbore the murder of his own Brothers, the breach of Faith, the buying of other mens Fidelity; he esteem'd no place strong where his A's loaden with Gold might enter; nor any City or State unconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subjection. And because he thought it vain to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had incho'd all the power they had within their own Walls, he entred their Territory, and by the advantage of a well-compounded and trained Army, he gave them two overthrowes as he fate down before the City it self: which done, he bought Eubæricates and Laphetes from their People, and from the service of their Country and Common-weal; by whose Treason he entred the Town, flew his Brothers therein, sackt it, and fold the Inhabitants for Slaves by the Drum. By the spoil of this place he greatly enrich'd himself, and had Treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withal, which he daily did. For so was he advis'd by the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That he should make his affairs with Silver Spears: Whereupon Horace well and truly said,

— Diffidit Urbium
Portas vir Macedo, & subruit emulos Reges mænebris.

Hæ. Caton
3. Od. 15.

By gifts the Macedon clave Gates afunder,
And Kings envying his estate brought under.

And it is true that he won more by corruption and fraud than he did by force. For as he had in all the principal Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spain.) So when in the contention between the Competitors for the Kingdom of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Council accompanied with Piety and Justice, but with a powerful Army, and having beaten and slain both Kings, gave Sentence for himself, and made the Kingdom his own.

§. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian War.

THE War still continuing between the Phocians and the Associates of the Holy War, the Boeotians finding themselves unable to subsist without some present aid, sent unto Philip for succour, who willingly yielded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men as were neither sufficient to matter their Enemies, nor to assure themselves; but yet to enable them to continue the War, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Antioxerus Ochus for supply of Treasure, who lent them thirty Talents, which makes an hundred and fourscore thousand Crowns; but when with these supplies they had fill'd the world in all their attempts against the Phocians, who held from them three of their strongest Cities within Boeotia it self; they then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandments in that War.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himself in state to give the law to both; and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he march'd with a speedy pace towards Boeotia; where being arriv'd, Phalætes, who commanded the Phocian Army, hearing to flock with this Victorious King, made his own Peace, and with-drew himself with a Regiment of eight thousand Soldiers into Felsopomene, leaving the Phocians to the mercy of the Conqueror; and for conclusion, he had the glory of that War, called Sacred, which the Greeks with so many mutual slaughter had continued for ten years; and, besides the glory, he possid'd himself of Orchomenus, Coronea, and Corissa, in the County of the Boeotians, who invited him to be victorious over themselves. He brought the Phocians into servitude, and wasted their Cities, and gave them but their Villages to inhabit, relieving to himself the yearly Tribute of threecore Talents, which make fix and thirty thousand French Crowns. He also hereby (besides the fame of Piety for service of the Gods) obtained the fame double voice in the Council of the Amphictyons, which the Phocians had, with the superintendency of the Pythian Games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian Sacrilege.

How Philip with ill success attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Philip after his Triumphant return into Macedonia, by the Lieutenant of his Army Parnonius, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians and Dardaniens, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their Revenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians raised his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, seated upon Propontis in the mid-way between Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a People resolved to defend their Liberty against Philip, where the Asiatics encouraged and assisted them. Philip laid down before it with a puissant Army, made many fair Breaches, gave many furious Assaults, built many over-topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repelled with equal violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continual Assaults to weary them, and waste both their Men and Munition, they were supplied, not only from the Perseus which they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoever was wanting to their necessity. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their Neighbourhood, and the easy passage by Water, gave them often and ready help, Philip removed with the one half of his Army and Besieged it, leaving fifteen thousand Foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; but to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly do that undertake divers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedonia with no less dishonour than loss: whereupon he made an Overture of Peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it; to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions, yet Demophilus with his Eloquence prevailed in the refusal. In the mean while, Philip having digested his late Affront, and supplied his expence by the taking of an hundred and threecore and ten Merchants Ships, he gathered new Forces, and being accompanied with his Son Alexander, led them into Scythia; but he was also unprosperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a People of Mesias, set on him in his return, wounded him, and took from him the greatest part of the spoils which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip, overthrowing the Greeks in the Battle of Cheronea, was chosen Captain-General of Greece. The death of Philip.

Among these Northern Nations (part of which he suppressed, and part quieted) he spent some eight years; and in the ninth year, after the end of the Holy War, he was to his great advantage invited again by the Gracians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissia having disobeyed the Decree of the Amphictyons, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Locrians gave countenance and aid to the Amphissians, the rest were not of themselves able to constrain them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must think that Philip was not long in resolving upon this enterprise; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keep back; nor other dissuasion than a marring power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march; the fame being compounded of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and with such expedition as could be made, he entered Phocia, won Plataea, and brought into subjection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to fear that a great part of this storm would fall on themselves, yet were they dissuaded by Demophilus from accepting such reasonable Conditions of Peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (having drawn the Thebans to join with them) to leave the enjoying of their Estates and their Freedom to the chance of one Battle, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Orators Eloquence cost them dear. It is true, that he could far more easily mind them of the virtue of their Ancestors, than make them to be such as they were. He might repeat unto them (with words moving passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transform the Macedonians into Perseus, nor draw from the dead, a Milvades, an Arifides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great virtues they had paid with the greatest ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrary Faction he was at this time in disgrace, and not employed: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates encountered, although some thousand of the Athenians abid the killing, and the like number well near of the Thebans died with them, yet the want of worthy men on that side to hold up the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, encouraged by a King of a growing Fortune, as it gave to Philip so shining a Victory, that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of all the Nations interjacent) into Perseus, India, and Aegypt; so it cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Gracian glory: Yea, their liberty (saith Curtius) with their large Dominion won with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for ever lost.

Now this advised King (never passionate to his disadvantage) to the end he might obtain the Sovereignty over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captain-General against the Perseians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let go those Athenians that were taken at this Battle of Cheronea, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their City: but in Thebes (which lately by the virtue of Eparinondas triumphed over the rest) he lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soon after (according unto the long desire which he had nourished of this Sovereignty) by the general States at Corinth, filled The first Commander of all the Gracians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Army of great strength, and under the commandment of Attalus and Parnonius, transported the same over the Hellefont into Asia, to begin the War. Of his enterprise against Perseus he fought the success he received such another convertible from whence he received such another convertible Riddle, as Ctesias did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the expofition.

But as it is hard to discern and withstand the flatteries of our own appetites, so did Philip's ambitious desire to invade Perseus, abuse his judgment for that the death, wherewith himself was threatened, he understood to be delivered of his Enemy, when he intended presently to invade. Before whom he departed into Asia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with Alexander King of Epirus; to which Feast and Pastimes thereof appointed, he invited all his Friends and Allies, with the principal persons of the Gracian Cities, from whom he received much Honour and many rich Presents; but this was indeed the Feast of his Funeral. For having refused to do justice to one Paulonius, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly favoured by Philip) had first made drunk, and then left to be carnally abused by divers base persons, this Paulonius grew into to great detestation of the Kings partiality in so foul a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theatre, he drew a Sword from under his long Garment and wounded him to death, when he had lived fix and forty years, and reigned five and twenty. Justine reports it, that Olympias encouraged Paulonius to Murder the King her Husband, which after his death she boldly avowed, by the honour she did unto Paulonius, in crowning his dead Body, in consecrating his Sword unto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatness were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities, and Issues.

NOW although he were then taken from the World, when he had matted all opposition on that side the Sea, and had seen the fruits of his hopes and labours, changing colour towards his hopes and perfection, yet he was herein happy, that he lived to see his Son Alexander at mans estate, and had himself been an Eye-witness of his resolution, and singular Valour in this last Battle.

The foundation of whose future greatness he laid lost so soundly for him, with so plain a pattern of the buildings which himself meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was far more easy to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings were unto Philip, though less famous. For besides the recovery of Macedon it self, in competition between him and the Sons of Aegyptus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians; and besides the regaining of many places possessed by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the overthrow of Olympus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritime Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedom, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it self against the greatest Kings of the World, and won upon them: He left unto his Son, and had bred up for him, so many choice Commanders, as the most of them both for their valour and judgment in the War, were no less worthy of Crowns, than himself was that were a Crown: For it was said of Parnonius (whom Alexander, ungrateful to so great virtue, impiously murdered) That Parnonius had performed many things challenging eternal fame, without the King, but the King, without Parnonius, never did any thing worthy of Renown; as for the rest of his Captains, though content to obey the Son of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexander's death endure to acknowledge any man Superior to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more Virtues, than Nature, and his excellent Education had enriched him with Virtues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of all his Affections, he had this favour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satisfy those that were grieved, than to suppress them. Whereof (among many other) we find a good example in his dealing with Arceon and Nicomar; whom, when for their evil speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; He answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gave him ill language, or in himself: Secondly, that it was in every mans own power to be well spoken of; and this was shortly proved; for after Philip had relieved their necessities, there was none within his Kingdom that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told those that had perswaded him to use violence, that he was a better Physician for evil speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his Son are remembered by Cicero and Gellius; and by Dion and Crisostom exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyenus and Frontinus, his wife sayings by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedon as his own right, all the time of his Reign, yet was he not the true and next Heir thereof: For Amyntas the Son of his Brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the Protection during his Infancy) had the right. This Amyntas he married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, which was married to Philip's base Son Aridaus, her Uncle by the Mothers side: both which Olympias, Philip's first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridaus by extreme torments: Eurydice the strangler.

Philip had by this Olympias, the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians, (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Uncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexander's death slain at Sardis, by the commandment of Antigonus.

By Autaea, an Illyrian, his second Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before.

By Nicostris, the Sister of Jafon, Tyrant of Pheres, he had Thestalonica, whom Cleander, after he had taken Pidna, married; but she was afterwards by her Father-in-law, Antipater, put to death.

By Cleopatra, the Niece of Attalus, he had Cassander, whom others call Philip: him, Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be roasted to death in a Copper Pan. Other lay this Murder on Alexander himself. By the fame Cleopatra he had likewise a Daughter, called Eurydice, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers breast.

By Phila and Meda he had no Issue.

He had also two Concubines, Asmode, whom, after he had gotten with Child, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Phology, King of Aegypt, called the Son of Lagus, but esteemed the Son of Philip: by Philomena, his second Concubine, a publick Dancer, he had Aridemus, of whom we shall have much occasion to speak hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of ALEXANDER the Great.

§. I.

A brief rehearsal of Alexander's doings, before he invaded Asia.

ALEXANDER, afterward called the Great, succeeded unto Philip his Father; being a Prince no less valiant by Nature, than by Education; well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his Reign over the Macedonians four hundred and seventeen years after Rome built, and after his own Birth twenty years. The strange Dreams of Philip his Father, and that one of the Gods, in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as foolish tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a Work the most magnificent of the World) was burnt upon the day of his Birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the news of three several Victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and fore-shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had oppressed, began to consult about the recovery of their former Liberty, and to adventure it by force of Arms. Alexander's young years gave them hope of prevailing, and his suspected severity increased courage in those who could better resolve to die, than to live slavishly. But Alexander gave no time to those swelling Humours, which might speedily have endangered the health of his Estate. For after revenge taken upon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he flew upon his Tomb; and the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastened unto him his own Nation, by freeing them from all exactions and bodily slavery, other than their service in his Wars; and used such Kingly austerity towards those that contemned his young years, and such clemency to the rest that perwaded themselves of the cruelty of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, he made a present Journey unto Peloponessus, and so well exercised his Spirits among them, as by the Council of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captain-General against the Perians, upon which War Philip his Father had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same Title of General Commander) but had transported under the leading of Pericles and Aralius, a part of his Army, to recover some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Perians occupied all Alexander's affections: those fair marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now then at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts and imaginations were either grievous or hateful. But a contrary wind arising; for he receiveth advertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedaemonians, had united themselves against him, and by assistance from the Perians, hoped for the recovery of their former freedom. Hereto they were perwaded by Demosthenes, himself being thereunto perwaded by the Gold of Persia; the device he used was more subtil than profitable, for he caused it to be bruited that Alexander was slain in a Battle against the Triballes, and brought into the Assembly a Companion whom he had corrupted to affirm, That himself was present and wounded in the Battle. There is indeed a certain Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now adays defined by falsehood and knavery) that devised rumours and lies, if they serve the turn, but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true, that common People are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarms in the Wars; but in all that I have observed, I have found the success as ridiculous as the invention. For as those that find themselves at one time abused by such like brutes, do at other times neglect their duties, when they are upon true reports, and in occasions perillous, fumed to assemble; so do all men in general condemn the venters of such trumpery, and for them fear upon necessary occasions to entertain the truth itself. This labour unlooked for, and loss of time, was not only very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his Sword from the ignoble and effeminate Perians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Graecians; of whose assistance he thought himself assured, his present undertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to strive against the Wind, shall hardly attain the Port which he purposeth to recover: and it no less becometh the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewail them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Revoltors, as that himself, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first news of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moved, for they were the first that faintest, seeking by their Embassadors to pacify the King, and to be received again into his grace. Alexander was not long in relolving; for the Perians perwaded him to pardon the Graecians. Wise men are not easily drawn from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off; neither hath any King ever brought to effect any great affair, who hath entangled himself in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certain end.

And

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he relolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peones, Getes, Agrians, and other savage People, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessors, but even Philip his Father: with all which after divers overthrows given them, he made Peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good success, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more natural to man than Liberty; the Greeks had enjoyed it over-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once again. The Thebans, who had in their Citadel a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander halted to their succour, and presents himself with thirty thousand Foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand Horse, before the City, and gave the Inhabitants some days to relolve, being even heart-sick with the desire of passing into Asia. So unwilling indeed he was to draw blood of the Graecians, by whom he hoped to serve himself elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliver into his hands Phenix and Prigites, the stirrers up of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sea) instead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be delivered unto them; as if Thebes alone, then laid in the balance of Fortune with the Kingdom of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either have evened the scale or swayed it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacy. For while the Thebans oppose the Army assailing, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, the City taken and razed to the ground, six thousand slain, and thirty thousand sold for Slaves, at the price of four hundred and forty Talents. This the King did, to the terror of the other Graecian Cities.

Many Arguments were used by Cleodas, one of the Prisoners, to perwade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to believe that they were rather misled by giving hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perwaded of Alexander's death, they rebelled but against his Successor. He also besought the King to remember, that his Father Philip had his Education in that City; yea, that his Ancestor Hercules was born therein: but all perwases were fruitless; the times wherein offences are committed, do greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to Learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timocles, the Sister of Theogenes, who died in defence of the Liberty of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noble Woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ravished, he threatened to take her life, unless she would confess her Treasure; she led the Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it; and when the Thracian stooped to look into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now, because the Athenians had received into their City so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled unto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them Peace, but upon condition to deliver into his hands both their Orators which perwaded this second revolt, and their Captains; yet in the end, it being a torment unto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remain, and accepted of the banishment of the Captains, wherein he was exceeding ill advised, had not his Fortune, or rather the Providence of God, made all the resistance against him unprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Graecians betook themselves to the service of the Perians, whom after a few days he invadeth.

§. II.

How Alexander passing into Asia, fought with the Perians upon the River of Granicus.

WHEN all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did pass the Hellefont, and being ready to disembark, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waste in their own Territory, or to burn or deface those Buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possess. He landed his Army, consisting of two and thirty thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse, all old Souldiers, near unto Troy, where he offered a Solemn Sacrifice upon Achilles Tomb, his maternal Ancestor.

But before he left his own Coast, he put to death, without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-laws Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing such of his own as he suspected. He also took with him many of his Tributary Princes, of whose Fidelity he doubted; thinking by unjust Cruelty to assure all things both in the present and future. Yet the end of all tell contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended unto him, though agreeing very well with the Justice of God; for all that he had planned, was soon after withered, and rooted up; those whom he most trusted, were the most traitorous; his Mother, Friends, and Children, fell by such another merciless Sword as his own, and all manner of confusion followed his dead Body to the Grave; and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexander's landing on Asiatick was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Army of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himself, as having filled him his Servant on a Letter which he wrote unto him, reprehending his disloyalty and audacity (for Darius entituled himself King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the Gods) he gave order wishal to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander alive, whip him with Rods, and then convey him to his presence: that they should sink his Ships, and send the Macedons taken Prisoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike unto Aethiopia, or some other unhealthy part of Africa.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartless multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians: But the ill destinies of men bear them to the ground, by what strong confidence soever armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heap into the Field, gave rather an exceeding advantage to his Enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men utterly unacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to prevail against those of less courage than themselves; men that took more care how to embroider with Gold and Silver their upper Garments, as if they attended the invasion but of the Sun-Beams, than they did to Arm them-themselves with Iron and Steel against the sharp Pikes, Swords, and Darts of the hardy Macedonians; I say besides all these, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turn to fight, filled every of them with the care of their own safety, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their own Breath, and that of their Horses, in running away. The Macedonians as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the Gold and Jewels of Persia, both which they needed, so the Persians who expected nothing in that War but Blows and Wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his Service; but their own Fears and Cowardice, which in time of danger had most power over them, they only then obeyed, when their Rebellion against to serve a Passion did justly and violently require it. For faith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles pressum caput, ita formidat indoluit; nam celandum est in pugna utiam amplius proficere quam vires; At the well-practised Soldier desires to come to battle, for the raw one fears it: for we must understand, that in Fight is more avails to have been accustomed unto the like, than only to have rude strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discovered in the first Encounter, before which time it is said, by those that write his Story, That it was too hard to judge, whether his Daring to undertake the Conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handful of men, or the success he had, were more to be wondered at. For at the River of Granick, which severeth the Territory of Troy from Prioponia, the Persians fought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and bank of the River to defend upon, and scale from the Level of the water; great resistance (faith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it seems to me, that the Victory then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twenty thousand Persian Foot-men said to be slain, were rather kill'd in the back in running away, than hurt in the bosoms by resisting. For had those twenty thousand Foot, and two hundred and fifty Horse-men, or, after Plutarch, two thousand and five hundred Horse-men, died with their Faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their Lives at so small a rate, as with the loss of four and thirty of all sorts of his own. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Rhoebates, and that the Persian Horse-men fought with great fury, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Grecians in Darius his Pay, holding themselves in one body upon a piece of ground of advantage, did (after Mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance having been made, yet of Alexander's Army there fell but twelve Foot-men, and two and twenty Horse-men.

§. III.

A Digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the Battle of Granick.

THE winning of this Passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror upon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdoms thereof without a blow, some one or two Towns escaped. For in all invasions, where the Nations invaded have once been beaten upon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights and Mountains, they will soon have perfwaded themselves, that such an Enemy, upon equal terms and even ground, can hardly be refused. It was therefore Machibevols Counsel, that he which resolveth to defend a Passage, should with his ablest Force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such Force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarr'd all entrance, by the natural difficulty of the ways. One Passage or other is commonly left unguarded: if all be defended, then must the Forces of the Country be distracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often have the Alpes given way to Armies breaking into Italy? Yea, where shall we find that ever they kept out an Invader? Yet are they such, as (to speak briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that travel over them; but they give no security to those that lie behind them: for they are of two large extent. The Towns of Lombardy perfwaded themselves that they might enjoy their Quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers; had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchy of Milan: but whilst these Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in those Mountains had made fittest of all other for such a service, were busied in custody of the Alpes, Francis had expected his arrival. What shall we say of those Mountains, which lock up whole Regions in such fort, as they leave but one Gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the Gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopylae, have seldom been attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldom (if ever) have they been attempted in vain? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans forced the entrance of Thermopylae, Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly soever they had been locked and barred, yet were those Countries open enough to a Fleet that should enter on the backside. The defence of Rivers, how hard a thing it is, we find examples in all Histories that bear good witness. The deepest have many Floods; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boats, in case it be found a matter of difficulty to make a Bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his own Bank, hath also enough to beat his Enemy; and may therefore do better to let him come over, to his loss, than by striving in vain to hinder the Passage, as a matter tending to his own disadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an Opinion, that they are in an ill case, having their means of safe-guard taken from them, by the Skill or Valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly if a River were sufficient defence against an Army, the Isle of Mona, now called Angley, which is divided from North-Wales by an Arm of the Sea, had been safe enough against the Romans, invading it under conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making Vessels to transport his Forces, did assay the Floods; Whereby he so amazed the Enemies attending for Ships and such like Provision by Sea, that surely believing nothing could be hard or invincible to men, which came to mind to War, they humbly intreated for Peace, and yielded the Island.

Island. Yet the Britains were men stout enough; the Persians were Dairds.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to pass the River of Granick in face of the Enemy; not reaching higher to seek an easier way, nor labouring to convey his men over it by some far means. For having beaten them upon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no less of their Reputation than of their Strength, leaving no hope of honour to the partakers and followers of such unable Protectors.

Soon after this Victory he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magnesium, which were rendered unto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the People of the Country, he received with great grace, suffering them to be governed by their own Laws. For he observed it well; Novum imperium inchoantibus utilis clementia fons: it is commodious unto such as lay the Foundation of a new Sovereignty to have the Fame of being merciful. He then by Parmenio won Miletus, and by force malted Halicarnassus, which, because it resisted obstinately, he razed to the ground. From thence he entered into Caria, where Ada the Queen, who had been cast out of all that she held (except the City of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenant, presented her self unto him, and adopted him her Son and Successor; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdom to her disposing. He then entered into Lycia and Pamphilia, and obtained all the Sea Coasts, and subjecting unto him Pisidia, he directed himself towards Darius (who was said to be advanced towards him with a marvellous Army) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Province of Asia the Less, bordering upon the Sea, his first Victory laid under his feet.

While he gave order for the Government and setting of Lycia, and Pamphilia, he sent Cleander to raise some new Companies in Peloponnese; and marching towards the North, he entered Celenas, seated on the River Meander, which was abandoned unto him, the Castle only holding out; which also after forty days was given up: for long time he gave them to attend Succour from Darius. From Celenas he pass'd on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regal Seat, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was that he found the Gordian Knot, which when he knew not how to undo, he cut it asunder with his Sword: For there was an ancient Prophecie did promise to him that could untie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himself the fulfilling of the Prophecie, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the Less towards the East, he took care to clear the Sea-Coast on his back, and to thrust the Persians out of the Islands of Lesbos, Scio, and Cos, the charge whereof he committed unto two of his Captains, giving them such order as he thought to be most convenient for that Service; and delivering unto them fifty Talents to defray the Charge; and wialch, out of his first spoil gotten, he sent threethree Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece, and Macedon. From Celenas he removed to Ancira, now called Anguiri, standing on the same River of Sangarius, which runneth through Gorgium: there he mustred his Army, and then entered Paphlagonia, whose People submitted themselves unto him, and obtained freedom of Tribute: where he left Carus Governor, with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he understood of the Death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to pass on towards him, for of this only Captain he had more respect than of all the Multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For to much hath the Spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath undertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Commonwealths, the Erection of Monarchies, the Conquest of Kingdoms and Empires, guided handlings of men against multitudes of equal bodily strength, contrived Victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, converted the fearful Passions of his own Followers into magnanimity, and the Valour of his Enemies into Cowardize; such spirits have been stirred up in sundry Ages of the World, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and cast down again, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States to the same certain ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Universal, piercing, moving, and governing all things hath ordained. Certainly the things, that this King did were marvellous, and would hardly have been undertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to have invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would have contented himself with some part thereof, and not have discovered the River of Indus, as this man did. The swift course of Victory, wherewith he ran over so large a Portion of the World, in so short a space, may justly be imputed unto this, That he was never encountered by an equal Spirit, concurring with equal Power against him. Hereby it came to pass that his actions being limited by the greater opposition than desert places, and the meer length of tedious Journeys could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the Workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge Bulk. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as brave a Spirit as Alexander, and working no less exquisitely, though the effects were less material, as were also the Forces and Power of Command, by which it wrought. But he that would find the exact pattern of a noble Commander, must look upon such as Epaminondas, that encountering worthy Captains, and those better followed than themselves, have by their singular Vertue overtopped their valiant Enemies, and fill prevailed over those that would not have yielded one foot to any other. Such as these do seldom live to obtain great Empires; for it is a Work of more labour and longer time, to master the equal Forces of one hardy and well-ordered State, than to tread down and utterly subdue a multitude of servile Nations, compounding the body of a gross unwieldy Empire. Wherefore these Parvo Potentes, men that with little have done much upon Enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerors, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactness and greatness concurring to seldom, that I can find no instance of both in one, save only that brave Roman Caesar.

Having thus far digressed, it is now time that we return unto our Eastern Conqueror, who is travelling hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he repos'd most trust, some of the Persian Targets which he had recovered in his first Battle; upon which, by certain Inscriptions, he made them partakers of his Victory. Herein he well advised himself; for he that doth not as well impart of the Honour which he gaineth in the Wars, as he doth of the Spoils, shall never be long followed by those of the better fort. For men which are either well born or well bred, and have more of Wealth than of Reputation, do as often faristhe themselves with the purchase of Glory, as the Weak in Fortune, and Strong in Courage, do with the gain of Gold and Silver.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander's coming on, left some Companies to keep the Streights, which were indeed very defensible; and withal, as Carinus noeth, he began over late to prize and put in execution the Council of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Wars advised him to wait all the Provisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, and always to give ground to the Invader, till he found some such notable advantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of Victory. For the fury of an invading Army is best broken by delays, change of Diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselves in Beds, and more often on the cold Ground. Thence and the like sudden alterations bring many Disasters upon all Nations out of their own Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from Meat and Sleep, and refusing to give or take Battel, had wearied them with his light Horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance have saved his own Life and his Estate: For it was one of the greatest Incouragements given by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatal Battel, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes when he invaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost only his Men; but Darius being invaded by the Greeks, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdom; Pericles, though the Lacedaemonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawn to hazard a Battel: for the Invaded ought evermore to fight upon the advantage of time and place. Because we read Histories to inform our Understanding by the Examples therein found, we will give some instances of those that have perished by adventuring in their own Countries to charge an invading Army. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brink of their Destruction.

Pompey was well advised for a while, when he gave Caesar ground, but when by the impetuosity of his Captains he adventured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the Battel, lost the freedom of Rome, and his own life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a Battel with the French to his Confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound judgment, that those Councils which promise fury in all things are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fifth, when he invaded Provence, by waisting the Country, and forbearing the Fight; so did the Duke of Alva weary the French in Naples, and dissolve the boisterous Army of the Prince of Orange in the Low Countries.

The Leigers, contrary to the advice of their General, would needs fight a Battel with the Bourgonians, invading their Country, and could not be persuaded to linger the time, and stay their advantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand upon the place. Philip of Valois set upon King Edward at Cressy, and King John (when the English were well near tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit have been waisted to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great fury, near Poitiers, to joyn Battel with him: But all men know what lamentable success these two French Kings found. Charles the Fifth of France made an other kind of Fabian Warfare; and though the English burnt and waisted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear Blows, and followed his advice which told him, That the English could never get his Inheritance by smok; and it is reported by Belay and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that he won from him the Duchy of Guinea without ever putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wife men grow short lived, and the charge of things is committed unto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any found advice. The course which Memnon had propounded, must, in all appearance of reason, have brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shameful to return, or dangerous to proceed. For had Capadocia and Paphlagonia been waisted whilst Alexander was far off; and the Streights of Cilicia defended by Arfenes, Governour of that Province, with the best of his Forces: hunger would not have suffered the Enemy to stay the trial of all means that might be thought upon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not have been maintained, yet might Cilicia at better leisure have been so thoroughly spoiled, that the Heart of his Army should have been broken, by seeking out miseries with painful travel.

But Arfenes leaving a small number to defend the Streights, took the best of his Army with him, to wait and spoil the Country; or rather, as may seem, to find himself some work, by presence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. He should rather have adventured his Person in custody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps have saved the Province; and in the mean time, all that was in the Fields would have been conveyed into strong Towns. So should his Army, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himself with his Horsemen have had the less work in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gave the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexander's coming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the Passage not to hinder it. For Cowards are wise in apprehending all forms of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arfenes made all hast to joyn himself with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, began to grow circumpect, and to think that surely their General, who gave as lost the Country behind their backs, had exposed themselves unto certain death, as men that were good for nothing else but to dull the Macedonian Swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Country (which Honour they saw that Arfenes himself could well forbear) they speedily followed the foot-steps of their General, gleaming after his Harveit. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, and the whole Province that had been alienated from the Persian side by their indifcretion.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of the unwelcome Army levied by Darius against Alexander. The unwelcome courtes, which Darius took in this expedition. He is vanquished at Illus; where his Majesty, Wife, and Children are made Prisoners, of some things following the Battel of Illus.

IN the mean season Darius approached, who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Army of more than two hundred and ninety thousand Soldiers, out of divers Nations: Justice musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and an hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch at six hundred thousand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a Masker than a Man of War; and like one that took more care to set out his Glory and Riches, than to provide for his own safety, perfwading himself, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pomp and sumptuous Pageants. Before the Army there was carried the holy fire which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threescore and five young men, answering the number of the days of the year, covered with Scarlet: then the Chariot of Jupiter, drawn with Scarlet; then their Riders clothed in the white Horles, with Rods of Gold in their hands; and after it, the Horle of the Sun. Next after these followed ten sumptuous Chariots, inlaid and garnished with Silver and Gold; and then the Vanguard of their Horle, compounded of twelve federal Nations, which the better to avoid confusion, did hardly understand each others Language, and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serve very fitly to disorder all that followed them; in the tail of these Horles the Regiment of Foot marched, with the Persians called immortal, because if any died, the number was presently supplied; and these were armed with Chains of Gold, and their Coats with the same metal embroidered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with Pearl, baits, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withal, or to persuade them that they were great incivility to cut and to deface such glorious Garments. But it was well said, Sumptuose nudamine miles, se virtute superiorem alius non existimet, cum in preliis oportet fortitudine animi, & non vestimentis nunciari, quoniam hostes vestibus non debilitantur; Let no man think that he exceedeth those in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparel they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was per chance from the Roman Papirius that this advice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Saminites in that fatal Battel, wherein they all swore either to prevail or die, thirty thousand of them having apparelled themselves in white garments, with high Crests and great plumes of Feathers, did the Roman Soldiers to lay aside all fear: Non enim cristas vinientia facere, & per picta atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no body, and the Roman pike would bore bores in painted and gilded Shields.

To second this Court-like company, fifteen thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breed the more terror) and these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen. Then came Darius himself, the Gentlemen of his Guard rode riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the Gods of his Nation, and cut in pure Gold; these the Macedonians did not serve, but they served their turns of these, by changing their maffie-bodies into thin porple and curran coat. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, covered with an open-winged Eagle of the same metal: The hinder part being railed high whereon Darius sat, had a covering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horle-men, their Lances plated with Silver, and their heads gilt; which they meant not to embroe in the Macedonian bloud, for fear of marring their beauty. He had for the proper Guard of his Person two hundred of the blood Royal, bloud too Royal and precious to be spilt by any valorous adventure, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy Fellows, like the Switzers, would have done him more service) and these were backt with thirty thousand Foot-men, after whom again were led four hundred spare Horles for the King, which if he had meant to have used he would have marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Rearward, the same being led by Sisyambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great train of Ladies their attendants on Horle-back, with fifteen Waggon of the Kings Children, and the Wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fifty Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously appalled: By which it should seem that Darius thought that the Macedonians had been Comedians or *Tumbler*s; for this Troup was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at Battels. Between these and a company of slight-armed Slaves, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings Treasure, charged on six hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came this May-game King into the Field, incumbered with a most unnecessary train of Scrumpers, attended with troops of divers Nations, speaking divers Languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled; and for the most part to effeminate, and so rich in Gold and in Garments, as the same could not but have encouraged the naked Nation of the World against them. We find it in daily experience that all discourses of Magnanimity, of National Verue, of Religion, of Liberty, and whatsoever else hath been wont to move and encourage veruous men, hath no force at all with the common Soldier, in comparison of Spoil and Riches. The rich Ships are boarded upon all disadvantages, the rich Towns are furiously assailed, and the plentiful Countries willingly invaded. Our English Nations have attempted many places in the Indies, and run upon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of Plate, and Pistoles, which had they been put to it upon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poor Country, they would have turned their Pieces and Pikes against their Commanders, confessing that they had been brought without reason to the butchery and slaughter. It is true, that the War is made willingly, and for the most part with good success, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needy are always adventurous, so plenty is wont to thin peril; and men that have well to live, do rather study how to live well, I mean wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car ex il ny a rien a gagner, que des coup volentiers il ny va pas; No man makes haste to the Market, where there is nothing to be bought but blows.

Now, if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Soothsayers, he would have satisfied himself by the out-sides of the Perfians, and never have looked into the entrails of Beasts for fuccell. For leaving the description of this second Batrel (which is indeed no where well described, neither for the confusion and hasty running away of the Affians could it be) we have enough by the slaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to inform us what manner of resistance was made. For it is to be true that threefcore thousand Perfian Foot-men were slain in this Batrel, with ten thousand of their Horse-men: Or (as Carine saith) an hundred thousand Foot-men, with the same number of Horse-men, and besides this slaughter, forty thousand taken Prisoners; while of Alexander's Army there miscarried but two hundred and four-score of all sorts, of which numbers Arrianus and other Historians cut off almost the one half: I do verily believe that this small number rather did with the over-travel and pains-taking in killing their Enemies, than by any frosts received from them. And surely if the Perfian Nation (at this time degenerate, and the basest of the World) had had any favour remaining of the ancient Valour of their fore-fathers they would never have sold so good cheap, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings Children, had their own honour been valued by them at nothing, and the Kings safety and his Estate at less. Darius by this time found it true that Charidemus, a banished Gracian of Athen had told him; when he made a view of his Army about Babylon; to wit, That the multitude which he had assembled of divers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the Country, whom in passing by they would devour, than to the Macedonians; whom they meant to assail; who being all old and obedient Soldiers, embattled in grofs Squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well covered with Armour for defence, and furnished with Weapons for offence of great advantage, would make so little account of his delicate Perfians, loving their ease and their palat, being withal ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertain (having so great abundance of Treasure to do it withal) a sufficient number of the same Gracians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equal courage, he would repent him over-late, as taught by the miserable success like to follow.

But this discourse was so unpleasant to Darius (who had been accustomed to nothing so much as to his own praisses, and to nothing so little as to hear truth;) as he commanded that this poor Gracian should be presently slain: who while he was affording in the Tormentary hands, used this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom he had given this good Council, should assuredly revenge his death, and lay deserved punishment upon Darius for despising his advice.

It was the saying of a Wife man: Deperata ejus Principis salus est, cujus gressus ita formata sunt, ut aspera quoque vias, nec quicquam nisi jucundum accipiat; Tot Virces safety is in a desperate call, whose Ears judge all that is profitable to be too sharp, and will entertain nothing that is unpleasant.

For liberty in Council is the life and essence of Council; Libertas consilii est ejus vita, & essentia, qua crepus consilium evanescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Advice given him by the Gracian Soldiers that served him, who intreated him not to fight in the Straights; but had they been Counsellors and directors in that War, as they were underlings and commanded by others, they had with the help of a good Troup of Horse-men been able to have opposed the fury of Alexander, without any assistance of the Perfian Foot-men. For when Darius was overthrown with all his cowardly and confused Rabble, those Gracians, under their Captain Amintas, held firm, and marched away in order, in despite of the vanquishers. Old Soldiers are not easily dismayed: we read in Histories Ancient and Modern, what brave retreats have been made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they have served, hath been broken.

At the Batrel of Roosme, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a Squadron of Swissards, old Soldiers, came off unbroken and undismayed, whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the Victory not entirely by their escape, he was overturned and slain in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers fear them not: That, Neglectis periculis, immemini mali opus ipsum quantumvis difficile aggressi sunt; They go about the business it self, how hard soever it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischief hanging over their heads may bring; and as truly of those that know the Wars but by hearsay. Quod valentes sunt & prevalentes ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis descendent; They have ability enough, and to spare, till dangers appear; but when perils indeed comes, they get them gone.

These Gracians also that made the retreat, advised Darius to retire his Army into the Plain of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entered into those large Fields and great Champions, he might have envied the Macedonian all sides with his multitude; and whilst they counselled him to divide that his huge Army into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many Batrels, and have brought no greater numbers at once than might have been well marshalled and conducted. But this counsel was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Perfians, as they persecuted Darius to environ the Gracians which gave the advice, and to cut them in pieces as Traytors. The infinite wisdom of God doth not work always by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdoms and Estates, by taking understanding from the Governours, so as they can neither give nor discern of Counsels. For Darius, that would needs fight with Alexander upon a straight piece of ground, near unto the City of Iffus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the advice of Parnemo said there, as in a place of best advantage) was utterly overthrown, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Gracians his followers had persuaded him to leave in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken Prisoners, and all their train of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queen, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexander's presence, were entertained with all respect due unto their Birth, their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored unto them; and though Darius's Wife was a most beautiful Lady, and his Daughters of excellent form, yet Alexander mastered his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristobolus the Historian, That he embraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parnemo, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Perfia in effect, fell into Captivity; at which time also Darius's Treasure (not lost at Iffus) was seized, amounting to six thousand and two hundred Talents of Coin, and of Bullion five hundred Talents, with a world of Riches besides.

Darius himself leaving his Brother dead, with divers other of his chief Captains (casting the Crown from his Head) hardly escaped.

After this overthrow given unto Darius, all Phenicia (the City of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parnemo was made Governour.

Atracis, Zidon, and Biblos, Maritime Cities of great importance, of which one Serato was King (but hated of the People) acknowledged Alexander.

Good Fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heels; for Amigonus, Alexander's Lieutenant in Asia the less, overthrew the Cappadocians; Yaphlagians, and others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius's Admiral, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly levied; the Lacedaemonians that warred against Alexander were beaten; four thousand of those Greeks which made the retreat at the last Batrel, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amynas into Aegypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdoms.

Alexander, to honour Ephesion, whom he loved most, gave him power to dispose of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a most poor Estate, that laboured to sustain his life, being of the Royal blood, was commended by the People unto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Begger and a King in one and the same hour.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wished that he could bear his prosperity with the same moderation, and quietness of heart, that he had done his adversity; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not perform in himself that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a sign that he did but accompany, and could not govern, his felicity.

While he made some stay in those parts, he received a Letter from Darius, importing the ransom of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of Peace, but such as rather became a Conquerour, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornful answer upon the offer of Peace, than they did before the trial of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leaf; the one revolted well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdaind the offers of Darius, and sent him word, that he not only desired his Letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himself.

§. V.

How Alexander besieged and won the City of Tyre.

Alexander coming near to the City of Tyre, received from them the Present of a golden Crown, with great store of Victuals, and other Presents, which he took very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a Sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their City, from whom he was defended. But the Tyrins like not his company within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adjoining, now abandoned and desolate: To be short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force, and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Island whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Main, yet with the labour of many hands, having great force of Stone from the old Tyre, and Timber sufficient from Lybannus, he filled the passage of the Sea between the Island and the Main, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea upon a storm of Wind, sometime by the Tyrins fired, and sometime torn asunder, yet with the help of his Navy which arrived (during the Siege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties that prevailed, after he had spent seven Months in that attempt. The Tyrins in the beginning of the Siege had barbarously drowned the Messengers sent by Alexander, persuading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great loss of time and men, he put eight thousand to the Sword, and caused two thousand of those that escaped the first fury to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserved for Slaves (saith Diodore) thirteen thousand: Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more he killed, had not the Zidonian, that served Alexander, conveyed great many of them away by Shipping unto their own City.

Happy it was for Apelle that the Town was taken, for one of the Tyrins having dreamt, that this God meant to forsake the City, they bound him fast with a golden Chain to the Idol of Hercules; but Alexander like a gracious Prince loosened him again.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprise and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled up the Channel, that lay between the Island and the Main.

The Government of this Territory he gave to Philotas, the Son of Parnemo; Cilicia he committed to Socrates and Antiochus Lieutenant under Parnemo; Ephesion had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to find Alexander at Gaza towards Aegypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered conditions of Peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza; and deals graciously with the Jews.

In the mean while Darius finds again to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and layeth the loss of the last Batrel to the straightness of the place: he hoped to terrify him, by threatening to encompass him in the plain Countries; he bids him consider, how impossible it was to pass the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearful things: for, he that was now filled with nothing but fear, had Arguments enough of that nature to present unto another. All the Kingdoms between the River of Aly and the Hellspont, he offered him in Dower with his beloved Daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his own, and that which Victory and his own Virtue had possessed him of: That he was to give Conditions, and not to receive any; and that he having passed the Sea it self, disdaind to think of resistance in transporting himself over Rivers. It is said, that Parnemo, who was now old, and full of Honour and Riches, told the King, that were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius

Mazens might have done some days before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of Horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, leaving the strength of their Foot out of fight, and far behind.

The new provisions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the Battel of Arbela.

Darius, upon Alexander's first return out of Aegypt, had assembled all the Forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Armenians, Syrians, Indians, and other Nations arrayed; Nations (saith Curcius) that rather served to make up the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrianus hath numbred them with their Leaders, and finds of Foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of Horse four hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curcius, who multiplies the Army of Darius at two hundred thousand Foot-men, and near fifty thousand Horse, comes in a little nearer to the true number; and yet straggle he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassals, in as much as he had gathered together, in all sorts some three or four hundred thousand, with which he hoped in those fair Parts of Affrica to have over-born the numbers of the invading Army. But it is a Rule in the Philosophy of the War.

In omni praelio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitium solent præstare victoriam; In every Battel skill and practice do more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gave rest to his Army after their victory over Jugur, there happened an Eclipse of the Moon, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant, (as the multitude always are) took it for a certain prelude of their overthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speak it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that dethroned Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Jupiter, they should fall all perish; For he not only enforc'd them to make War against worlds of Enemies, but against Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt; and to quiet the minds of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Africologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be assured that this defection of the Moon was a certain preface of good success; for that it was natural they never imparted to the common People, but reserved the knowledge to themselves, to as a foley Almanack-maker had been no small Fool in those days.

Of this kind of superstitious observation Cæsar made good use, when he fought against Arriovistus, and the Germans: for they being perfwaded by the casting of Lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moon, they should certainly lose the Batle, Cæsar forc'd them to abide it, though they durst not give it; wherein having their minds already beaten by their own superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect perished.

These Egyptians gave no other reason than this, That the Græcians were under the aspect of the Sun , the Persians of the Moon ; and therefore the Moon failing and being darkened, the state of Perſia was now in danger of falling, and their glory of being obſcured. This judgment of the Aegyptian Priests being noised through all the Army, all were ſatisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the War, which, though deviſed ſince, was well obſerved then. Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captain lead his Army to the fight, when it is ſolled with matter of terror.

It is truly observed by Curtius, that the People are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yet we find it in all Stories, and often in our own, that by such Inventions, devised Tales, Dreams, and Prophecies, the People of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous Tumults and Insurrections, and still to their own loss and

As Alexander drew near the Persian Army, certain Letters were surpris'd written by Darius to the Græcians, perswading them for great sums of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the advice of Parmenio he suppress'd.

At this time also Darius his fair Wife, opprest with sorrow, and wearied with travel, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no less to bewail than Darius, who upon the first burst suspected that some dishonourable violence had been offered her, but being satisfied by an Embus of his own that attended her, of Alexander's kindly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the Immortal Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Perſian Empire, then it would please them to confer it on fo just and content an Enemy as Alexander, to whom he once again, before the last tryal by Barrel, offered these Conditions of Peace.

That with his Daughter in Marriage he would deliver up and resign all Africa the Leds, and with Egypt, all those Kingdoms between the Phœnician Sea, and the River of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the Ransom of his Mother, and his other Daughter thirty thousand Talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leave to Son Oechim in hostage: To this they thought to persuade Alexander by such Arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Embassadors to be rejoined, advised with his Council, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good Father; who perswaded him to accept of the said Conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates and Hellespont was a fair addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian Prisoners was a great cumbrance; and that their Persons, for them of far better use, than their Persons, with divers other Arguments, all which Alexander rejected. And Antigonus is probable that if he had followed the good Advice, and bounded his Ambition within the same limits, he might have lived as famous for his Vertue as for Fortune, and left himself a Successor of able Age to have enjoyed his Estate; which afterward, indeed, he much enlarged, rather to the greatening of others than himself: who to assure themselves of what they had usurped upon his Illness, left not one of them to draw breath in the World within a few years after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so far into the East, left behind him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a just and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, advised, and grateful: and being taught new lessons by abundance of Prosperity, became a lover of Wine, of his own Flattery, and of extreme Cruelty. Year, as a young man, he had observed, the taint of one unjust Father, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourish in glory beary of all his great Acts and glorious Victories obtained. But the Perſian Embaſſadors ſay his anſwer, which was to this effect, That whosoever he had beſeigned on the Wife and Children of Darius, proceeded from his own natural Clemency and Magnanimity, without all reſpect to their Maſter; that therefore an Enemy was improper; that he made no Wars againſt his Enemy, but againſt thoſe that reſiſted him; Not againſt Women and Children, but againſt armed Enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great ſums of Money to perſwade his Friends to attempt upon his Perſon, he had reaſon to doubt that the Peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet he could not (were it otherwiſe and faithful) reſolve to haſte to accept the ſame, ſeeing Darius had made the War againſt him, not as a King with Royal and overt-force, but as a Traytor by ſecret and baſe practice: That for the Territory offered him, it was already his own, and if Darius could hear him back again over Euphrates, which he had already paſt, he would then believe that he offered him ſomewhat in his own power: Otherwiſe he propoſed to himſelf for the reward of the War which he had made, all thoſe Kingdoms as yet in Darius's poſſeſſion, wherein, whether he were abuſed by his own hopes or no, the Batrel which he meant to fight in the day following ſhould determine. For conſequation, he told them, that he came into Aſia to give, and not to receive; That the Heavens could not hold two Suns: and therefore if Darius could be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perſwaded to give him conditions fit for a ſecond Perſon, and his Inferiour.

§. X.

The Battel of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report hath made it.

W^Hith this answer the Embassadors return; Darius prepares to fight, and sends Mazæus to demand a hostage, which he never yet dared so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captains, Parmenio persuades him to force Darius his Camp by Night; so that the multitude of Enemies might not move terror in the Macedonians, being but few. Alexander disdains to steal the Victory, and resolves to bring with him the daylight, to witness his Valour. But it was the success that made good Alexander's resolution, though the counsel given by Parmenio was more found: For it is a ground in War, Sic pauci necessario cum multitudine pugnatæ coguntur, consilium ofi nostri tempore belli ferre non temere. Notwithstanding upon the view of the multitude at hand, he flatters and entrenches himself upon a ground of advantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for fear of surprise had flood with his Army in Armour all the day, and forborn sleep all the night; Alexander gave his men rest and store of Food, for Reason had taught him this Rule in the War, In pugna Milites valde ieiunantes, si cito potaque refecti fuerint, nam talibus intricatis pugna pugnat, quam ferus exterius: Solitudi: do the better stand it is to fight, if they have their bellies full of meat and drink, for hunger within fights more eagerly than steel without.

The numbers which Alexander had, faith Arrianus, were forty thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse; these belike were of the European Army; for he had besides both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He us'd but a short Speech to his Souldiers to encourage them, and I think that he needd little Rhetorick; for by the two former Batels upon the River of Granick and in Cilicia the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria Victoriam parat, animamque victoriosus angit, & adversarius adest: One Victory begets another, and puts courage into those that have already had the better, taking spirit away from such as have been beaten.

Arrianus and Curius make large descriptions of this Battle, fought at Gaugamela; They tell us of many charges and re-charges; That the Victory inclined fomerime to the Persians, fomerime to the Macedonians; That Permenus was in danger of being overthrown, who led the left Wing; That Alexander's Rear-guard was broken, and his Carriages loft; That for the first and valourous encounters on both sides, Fortune her self was long unrevolved on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retreat. But, in conclusion, Curius delivers us in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible days work; saying, That Ephibius, Perdiccas, and others of name, were wounded. Arrianus finds not a third part of this number slain; of the Persians there fell forty thousand (saith Curius), thirty thousand, according to Arrianus: Ninety thousand, if we believe Diodor. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former Battels, the Persians upon the first charge ran away, and that the Macedonians pursued? For if of these four or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the Field by Darius, every man had but cast a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not have fought the Empire of the East at ease; a rare, as fix or seven hundred men in three notorious Battels. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the banks of Euphrates, and had armed, but fifty or threeore thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the most part of all had no fit for the use of the Sapon) it had been impossible for Alexander to have resisted that River so easily, much less the River of Tigris. But as a man whole Empire God in his Providence had determined, he abandoned all places of advantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so far into the bowels of his Kingdom, as all hope and possibility of escape by retreat being taken from the Macedonians, they had preferred unto them the choice, either of death or victory; to which election Darius could no way constrain his own, seeing they had many large Regions to run into from thole that invaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the Battel of Arbela. The yielding of Babylon and Susa.

Darius after the rout of his Army recovered Arbela the same Night, better followed in his fight, than in the fight. He propounded unto them that ran after him his purpose of making a retreat into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoil and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities filled with Treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great mass of Treasure and Princely Ornaments, was rendred unto him.

for the fear which conducted Darius took nothing with it but shame and dishonour. He that had been twice beaten, should rather have sent his Treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so near the place where he abid the coming of his Enemies; if he had been victorious, he might have brought it after him at leisure; but being overcome, he knew it impossible to drive his Camels laden with Gold from the pursuing Enemy, leaving himself, at the overthrow he had in Cilicia, call the Crown from his Head to run away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Ergo prætoria magis reprehendi possunt quam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazæus, in whom Darius had most confidence, rendered himself, his Children, and the City. Altho the Captain of the Castle, who was keeper of the Treasure, flew the Streets with Flowers, burnt Frankincense upon Altars of Silver as Alexander passed by, and delivered unto him whatsoever was committed to his trust. Mage (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captain in great Solemnity to entertain their new King; after which came the Babylonian Horse-men, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poor in warlike furniture. Between these (though not greatly to be feared) and himself, Alexander caused his Macedonian Foot-men to march. When he entered the Castle he admired the glory thereof, and the abundance of Treasure therein found, amounting to fifty thousand Talents of Silver uncoined. The City it self I have else-where described, with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates, and the Circuit, with the wonderful place of Pleasure about two miles in circuit, surrounded with a Wall of four-score foot high, and on the top thereof (being under-born with Pillars) a Grove of beautiful and fruitful Trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queen and other Princesses might walk privately therein. In this City, rich in all things, but most of all in Voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himself and the whole Army four and thirty days, consuming that time in banqueting, and in all sorts of effeminate exercise, which so much softened the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the severe discipline of War which taught them the sufferances of Hunger and Thirst, of painful Travel, and hard Lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Soldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed over them, who thereupon were filled Chiliarchi. This new Order Alexander brought in, was to honour those Captains which were found by certain selected Judges to have deserved best in the late War. For before this time the Macedonian Companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing down of the foot-bands in this latter Age hath been the cause (altho the Macedonian had that the title and charge of a Captain hath been bestowed on every Pique Band or Sporn-Cow; for when the Captains of Foot had a thousand Soldiers under one Ensign, and after that five hundred, as in the time of France the first, the Title was honourable, and the Kings were less charged, and far better served. King Henry the Eighth of England never gave the Commandment of any of his good Ships, but to men of known Valour, and of great Estate; nay, sometimes he made two Gentlemen of Quality Commanders in one Ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe, for Antipater sent him six thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse; out of Macedon, of Thracians three thousand Foot, and the like number of Horse; and out of Greece four thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse; by which his Army was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon could hardly be brought again. De quiete la plume par dormis sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

He left the Castle and City of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge with three of his own Captains, to wit, Agathon, Mineus, and Apollodorus; to supply all wants a thousand Talents: but to grace Mazæus, who rendered the City unto him, he gave him the Title of his Lieutenant over all, and took with him Bagifines that gave up the Castle, and having distributed to every Soldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entered into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on towards Susa in Persia, the fame which Ptolemy, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the River Euphrates, a City sometime governed by Daniel, the Prophet. Abulites also, Governor of this famous City, gave it up to the Conqueror with fifty thousand Talents of Silver in Bullion, and twelve Elephants for the War, with all other the Treasures of Darius. In this fort did those Vassals of For Disce more in Perlon (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their own Peace and Safety with the Kings Treasures. And herein was Alexander well advised, that whatsoever Titles he gave to the King, he left all places of Importance in trust with his own Captains; to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) all the Nobility of Macedonia but in one Barrel, all the Nobility of Persia would have returned to their natural Lord. Those that are Traitors to their own Kings, are never to be used alone in great Enterprises by those Princes that entertain them, nor ever to be trusted with the defences of any Frontier-Town, or Fortress of weight, by the rendering whereof they may redeem their Liberty and Estates lost. Heroic the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Newcorra, being banished out of Spain, was trusted with Fontrabie, in the Year 1522.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazæus might have furnished the King from Babylon, and while he laid four and thirty days at Babylon, Abulites might have helped him from Susa; and while he feasted there, Tridates from Persepolis might have relieved him, for the great mass of Treasure was laid up in that City. But who hath sought out and friendly fearful Adversity? It is certain, that benefits bind not the ambitions, but the honest: for those that are but greedy of themselves, do in all changes of Fortune only consult the conservation of their own greatness.

The Government of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Macedonian, making Abulites, who rendered it unto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazæus and others, in giving them Titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Soldiers in Garrison to assure the place, and Darius's Mother and her Children to repose themselves.

It is said, that Charles the Fifth having promised Charles of Bourbon the Government of Marsilles, if he could have forced it, and whereof he made true account, told some of his nearest Counsellors, that he meant nothing less than the performance of that promise, because he should thereby have left the Duke (revolved from his Master) very well wherewithal to have recovered his favour.

§. XII.

How Alexander came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

FROM Susa Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he fought to pass those Mountains which funder Susana and Persepolis, he was soundly beaten by Arbaces, who defended against him those Sreights, called Pyle Perseide, or Sulide; and after the loss of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forced to save himself by retreat, causing his Foot to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain-top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Country, discovered unto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Arbaces, who being enforced to fight upon even ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis, but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) he returned and gave a second charge upon the Macedonians, where in he was slain. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515. find a way over the Alpes, the Switzers undertaking to defend all the passages, who, if their footmanhip had not saved them upon the Kings descent on the other side, they had been ill paid for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Four thousand Greeks, faith Curtius, (Justin numbers them but at eight hundred) having been taken Prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the Barbarous Persians to maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noes, Ears, and other Members, as they could no way have been known to their Country-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gave three hundred Crowns, with new Garments, and such Lands as they liked to live upon.

Tridates, one of Darius's false-hearted Grandees, hearing of Alexander's approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the People to spoil the Kings Treasure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexander's arrival, and they that stayed followed the worst Council, for all was left to the liberty of the Soldiers, to spoil and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the World at that time, which, if it had been laid in balance with Persepolis, would have weighed it down. Babylon, indeed, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulk and main store of the Persians. For after the spoil that had been made of Money, curious Plate, Bullion, Images of Gold and Silver, and other Jewels, there remained to Alexander himself one hundred and twenty thousand Talents. He left the same number of these thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, and gave the same formal Honour to the Traitor Tridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicardetes, a Creature of his own. The body of his Army he left here for thirty days, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand Horse, and certain Troups of chosen Foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had covered, a fruitless and foolish enterprise; but as Seneca lays: Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare;

He hath not a will to go, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise, That when his Soldiers cried out against him, because they could not endure the extrem Frost, and make way, but with extrem difficulty, through the Snow, that Alexander forsook his Horse, and led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to shew how well himself can endure it? His walking on foot did no otherwise take off their weariness that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drink did quench their thirst, that could less endure it. For mine own little judgment I shall rather commend that Captain, that makes careful provision for those that follow him, and that seeks wisely to prevent extrem necessity, than those wretches arrogant Fools, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Soldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of Victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Calpurnius, Admiral of France; That ubi so will shape that Beast (meaning War) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his Vertues, complain, that the opinion of his Valour, of his Liberality, of his Clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drink; That he smothered in carousing Cups all the reputation of his actions past; and that by descending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his own and all other Nations. For being perwaded, when he was inflamed with Wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and City of Persepolis, to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the Arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him: that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perwasures of others, which by his proper virtue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perwasion to the Asians, to think hardly of him, and thereby alienate their hearts: For they might well believe that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing less than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Fere violentiam crudelitas sequitur; Cruelly doth commonly follow drunkenness. For so it fell out soon after, and often, in Alexander.

§. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius's Death.

ABOUT this time he received a new supply of Soldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to find Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to have increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexander's coming on, with whom (trusting to such Companies as he had, which was numbered at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once again to try his Fortune. He thereupon calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds unto them his resolution, who being desperate of good success, used silence for a while. Arbaces, one of his eldest Men of War, who had sometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake

the Ice, and protesting that he could never be beaten by any adversity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firm confidence, that all the rest were of the same disposition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Nabarzanes and Bessus, whereof the latter was Governor of Bactria, had confired against their Master, and therefore advised the King to lay a new foundation for the War, and to pursue it by some such Person for the present, against whom neither the Gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an Enemy: this preamble Nabarzanes used, and in conclusion advised the election of his fellow-Traitor Bessus, with promise that the Wars ended, the Empire should again be restored to Darius. The King, swollen with disdain, pres'd towards Nabarzanes to have slain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the mean while Nabarzanes withdrew himself, and Bessus followed him, making their Quarter apart from the rest of the Army. Artabazus, the Kings faithful Servant, perswaded him to be advised, and serve the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at last make shew of forgetting the offence made, which the King, being of a gentle disposition, willingly yielded unto. Bessus makes his submission, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Pavon, who commanded a Regiment of four thousand Greeks, which had in all the former Battles served Darius with great fidelity, and always made the retreat in spite of the Macedonians, offered himself to guard his Person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus, but it was not in his destiny to follow their Advice, who from the beginning of the War gave him faithful Counsel; but he inclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greeks with Pavon their Captain were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the division of his faithful Servants. Bessus had drawn unto him thirty thousand of the Army, promising them all those things, by which the lovers of the World and themselves, are wont to be allure, to wit, Riches, Saicry, and Honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being overcome with Passion, as thinking himself unable to make head against these ungrateful and unnatural Traitors, he prayed Artabazus his faithful Servant to depart from him, and to provide for himself. In like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all save a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him. His Persians being most base Cowards, durst not undertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had four thousand Greeks to join with them, who had been able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himself, no man follows. It had been far more Man-like and King-like, to have died in the head of those four thousand Greeks, which offered him the disposition of their lives, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to have lien bewailing himself on the ground, and suffering himself to be bound like a slave by those ambitious Monsters that laid hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great Estate, nor the honours he had given them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could move to pity: no, nor his present adversity, which above all things should have moved them, could pierce their viperous and ungrateful hearts. Vain it was indeed to hope it, for incivility hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound and laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discovered; and to add despiteful and derision to his adversity, they fastened him with Chains of Gold, and to drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Nabarzanes perswaded themselves to redeem their Lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a Prisoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themselves Kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Arms. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most just, to pardon so strangely Villany, yea, though against a Prince purely Heathenish, and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his coming, hastened after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his foot-men beyond their powers, he mounted on horse-back certain selected Companies of them, and best armed, and with fix thousand other Horse, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forsook him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus took, and how near he was at hand; for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being discovered by Bessus his Rear, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to save himself. But the unfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, and flew two poor Servants that attended his Person. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercy of the Macedonian Swords.

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursuit of the vanquished pres'd with thirst, as he was refreshing himself with some Water that he had discovered, espousing a Cart with a Team of wounded Beasts breathing for life, and not able to move, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his own blood. And by a Persian Captive which followed this Polystratus, he understood that it was Darius, and was informed of this Barbarous Tragedy; Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the living God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrows unheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no less unworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their revenge to Alexander by this Messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his own Honour and for the safety of all that did, or should after wear Crowns. He also, having nothing else to present, rendered thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace used towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortal Gods to submit unto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking, impatient Death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired Water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the best things that the World had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, wherewith to desire the Gods to reward his Compassion.

§. XIV.

§. XIV.

How Alexander pursued Bessus, and took into his grace Darius his Captains.

It was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their Travels were near an end, every man preparing for his return. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved; for the bounded Earth sufficed not his boundless ambition. Many arguments he therefore used to draw on his Army farther into the East; but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruel Traitor to his Master Darius, having at his devotion the Hircanians and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should return) make himself Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the Fruits of all their former Travels. In conclusion, he wan their consents to go on: which done, leaving Cranus with certain Regiments of Foot, and Ampyrus with fix thousand Horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hircania; for the Mardians, and other barbarous Nations, defended certain passages for a while. He passeth the River of Zoborus, which taking beginning in Perthis, disposes it self in the Caspian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthis and Hircania, where hiding it self under ground for three hundred Furlongs, it then riseth again and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta, or Zadracarta, the same City which Ptolemy writes Hircania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteen days, banqueting and feasting therein.

Phanabazus, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with other of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their Places and Governments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved and constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greeks, the remainder of all those that had served Darius; He treats with Alexander for their Pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedemonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having slain himself. He was also wrought (though to his great dishonour) to receive Nabarzanes that had joined with Bessus to Murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of Thalestris, Queen of the Amazons; where, by way of digression it is shewed, that such Amazons have been, and are.

Here it is said, that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queen of the Amazons, came to visit him, and her suit was (which the easily obtained) That she might accompany him till she were made with Child by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her own Country.

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeed, the Letters of Alexander himself to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian business, may justly breed suspicion of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vain tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his Books to Lysimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his Voyages, was laugh'd at by the King for inferring such News of the Amazons, as Lysimachus himself had never heard of. One that accompanied Alexander, took upon him to write his Acts; which to amplify, He told how the King had fought first with an Elephant, and slain it. The King hearing such stuff, caught the Book, and threw it into the River of Indus, saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inferring such Fables disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we believe and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we give credit unto writers, making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. Therefore I will here take leave to make digression, as well to throw the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some modern discoverers touching these Warlike Women, because not only Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether or no, there were any such kind of People. Julius Solinus sits them in the North parts of Asia the Les. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the River Thermodon; the other, near the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the People call Sauromatidas. The former of these two had the Cimmerians for their Neighbours; Certum (saith Vasconius, who hath Commented upon Mela) illos proximis Amazonibus jussit. It is certain that the Cimmerians were the most Nations to the Amazons. Ptolemy sets them farther into the Land Northwards, near the Mountains Hippici, not far from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it self toward India, Solinus and Pliny tell us; where they governed a People called the Pandani, or Pandani, so called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest derive themselves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely, perhaps as a Poet) thus.

*Medis levibusque Sabæis
Imperat hic sexus: Reginarumque sub armis, Barbaria pars magna jacet.*

Claud. de cap. Proje-pina.

Over the Medes, and light Sabæans, reigns This Female Sex: and under Arms of Queen, Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

Diadorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermodon, a River falling into the Euxine Sea near Heraclium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tells us that the Syrians call Aorpatas, which is as much as Viricides, or Men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the Les, sack'd Ephejus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manetho and Acontinus report, which they performed forty years after Troy was taken. At the Siege of Troy it self we read of Penthesilea, That she came to the succour of Paris.

Ætial. l. 3.

Am. Metellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting upon the River of Thermodon, speaking confidently of the Wars they made with divers Nations, and of their overthrow.

Plutarch in the Life of Theseus, out of Philostratus, Hellenicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiope, Queen of the Amazons, by Hercules, and by him given to Theseus, though some affirm, That Theseus himself got her by stealth when she came to visit him aboard his Ship.

But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the Life of Pompey, speaks of certain Companies of the Amazons, that came to aid the Albanians against the Romans, by whom, after the Battel, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken up: and he saith farther, That these Women entertain the Gels and Lelages once a Year, Nations inhabiting between them and the Albanians.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez, who hath written the Navigation of Orellana, which he made down the River of Amazons from Peru, in the Year 1542. (upon which River, for the divers turnings, he is said to have failed six thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Council of the Indies, That he both saw those Women, and fought with them, where they fought to impeach his passage towards the East Sea.

It is also reported by Ulcricus Schmidel, that in the Year 1542. where he failed up the Rivers of Paragna and Paraboli, that he came to a King of that Country, called Scherues, inhabiting under the Tropick of Captivum, who gave his Captain Ernando Riffere, a Crown of Silver, which he had gotten in light from a Queen of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his description of the Kingdom of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling us, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burn off their right Breast, and live apart from Men, save at one time of the year, when they Feast and accompany them for one Month. These (saith he) possess a part of the Kingdom of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the Line: and that these Women are the strongest Guards of this Emperour, all the East-Indian Portugals know.

I have produced these Authorities, in part, to justify mine own relation of these Amazons, because that which was delivered me for truth by an ancient Casique of Guiana, how upon the River of Papamena (since the Spanish discoveries called Amazons) that these Women still live and govern, was held for a vain and unprofitable report.

§. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Persian's Luxury: and how he further pursued Bessus.

NOW as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Persepolis: so at this time his Prosperity had so much over-wrought his Virtue, as he accounted clemency to be but baseness, and the temperance which he had used all his life-time, but a poor and dejected humour, rather becoming the instructors of his Youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King, as the World could not equal. For he perfwaded himself that he now represented the greatness of the Gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him; he wore the Robes and Garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobility should do the like; he entertained in his Court, and Camp, the same shameless rabble of Curtians, and Sodomitical Eunuchs, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and derefted manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is Felicity, as notwithstanding that he was fully perfwaded that the Gods, whom he served (derefting the vices of the invaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himself, contrary to the Religion he profess'd (which how Idolatrous soever it were, could not be but fearful unto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by Ignorance or Education, a more foul and fearful Monster than Darius, from whose Tyranny he vaunted to have delivered so many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and nearest unto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornful discourse, That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example the Macedonians were in the end of so many Travels more impoverished in their Virtues, than enriched by their Victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerours, or the conquered were the baser Slaves. Neither were these opinions so referved, but that the noise of them came to his ears. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacify the better sort, and those of whose judgments he was most jealous; and making it known to the Army that Bessus had assumed the Title of a King, and called himself Artaxerxes; and that he had compounded a great Army of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had Arguments enough to perfwade them to go on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselves (so far engaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoils of so many Cities, as the whole Army seemed but the guard of their Carriages, (not much unlike the warfare of the French) having commanded every mans Fardels to be brought into the Market-place, he together with his own, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but have proved most dangerous unto him, seeing the common Souldiers had more interest in these things, which they had bought with their painful Travels, and with their Blood, than in the Kings Ambition; had not (as Seneca often observed) his happy temerity overcome all things. As he was in his way, news came to him that Satibarzanes, whom he had established in his former Government over the Arrians, was revolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he fought him out, but the Rebel hearing of his coming, fled to Bessus with two thousand Horles. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of Wood on fire with the advantage of a strong Wind, won a passage over a high and unaccessible Rock, which was defended against him with thirteen thousand Foot. For the extremity of the flame and smoke forced them from the place, otherwise Invincible. I saw in the third Civil War of France certain Caves in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any Ladder or Engine, till at last by certain bundles of Straw let down by an Iron Chain, and a weighty stone in the midst, those that defended it were so smothered, as they rendered themselves with their Plate, Money, and other Goods therein hidden. There were also, some three years before my arrival in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horles, by the Country People, who did set the long dry Grass on fire to the Eastward of them, (the Wind in those parts being always East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the fire, there was not any one that escaped. Sir J. Borlase also, with an hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by having the Grass fired behind him, but the smoke being timely discovered, he recovered the Sea-shore shore with the loss of sixteen of his men. I remember these things, but to give caution to those that shall in times to come invade any part of those Countries, that they always, before they pass into the Land, burn down the Grass and Sedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other Enemy than a handful of Straw set on fire, die the death of Hony-Bess, burnt out of the Hive.

§. XVII.

A Conspiracy against Alexander. The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

Alexander was, after he parted hence, no where resettled, till he came into Asia, to the East of Bactria, where the chief City of that Province, called Artaxana, was a while defended against him, by the revolt of Satibarzanes, but in the end he received the Inhabitants to mercy. At this place his Army was re-enforced with a new supply of five thousand Horse, out of Greece, Thelaly, and near five hundred Horse, out of Greece, Thelaly, and other places. His Journey out of Perfia into these parts is very confusedly described. For having (as all his Historians tell us) a determination to find Bessus in Bactria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania; from thence he wanders Northward towards the obscure Mardi, upon the Caspian-Sea, and thence over the Mountains Coromus into Asia and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the Treason of Dimmus brake out, of which Philotas the Son of Parmenio was accused, as accessory, if not principal. This Dimmus, having (I know not upon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loved, into the same Treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by Oath to secrecy, when he heard so foul a matter uttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his Friend was like to have slain him for security of his own Life. So constrained by fear, he made shew as if he had been won by perfwasion, and by seeming at length to like well of the business, he was told more at large what they were, that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of Rank; whose Names Dimmus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned up to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no sooner fixed himself from the company of this Traytor Dimmus, than he acquainted his own Brother Ceballinus with the whole History: whereupon it was agreed between them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspicion) should go to the Court and utter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole business, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith; which he promised to do, but did not. Two days passed, and Philotas never brake with the King about the matter; but still excused himself to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldness bred suspicion, and caused Ceballinus to address himself to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armory, who forth-with brought him to Alexander's presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed between Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perfwade himself that this concealment of the Treason, argued his hand to have been in the business. Therefore when Dimmus was brought before him, he asked the Traytor no other question than this: Wherein here I offended thee, that thou shouldst think Philotas more worthy to be King than I? Dimmus perceiving, when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himself, that he lived no longer than to give his last groan in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspicion which his silence might justly breed. His answer was, That when the practice was revealed unto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to be but frivolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithal, until he might have better information. This error of his, (if it were only an error) although Alexander, for the notorious services of his Father Parmenio, of his Brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himself, had freely pardoned and given him his hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he again swallowed his Princely promise, and made his Enemies his Judges: Craterus gives a note of Craterus in this business; How he perfwaded himself, that he could never find a better occasion to oppress his private Enemy, than by pretending Piety and Duty towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath given a note as much better as it is more general in his Philotas.

See how these great men cloath their private hate,
In these fair colours of the publick good,
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood,
And arm'd with power and Princes jealousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest rank of Treacheries,
That no one action shall seem innocent;
Yea, Valour, Honour, Bounty, shall be made
As accessories unto ends unjust:
And even the Service of the State must lade
The needfull'th' undertaking with distrust,
So that base vileness, idle Luxury,
Seem fairer far, than to do worthily, &c.

Now although it were so that the King, following the advice of Craterus, had resolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very Evening of the same Night in which he was Apprehended, he called him to a Banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the Night Philotas was taken in his Lodgings, and that they which hated him began to bind him, he cried out upon the King in these words: O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is far more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were urged against him by Alexander himself; (for the Kings of Macedon did in Person examine the accusations of Treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeed, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote unto him concerning the Tide given him by Jupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but rejoice that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the Gods, and yet he could not but withal grieve for those that should live under such a one as would exceed the nature of Man. This was (saith Alexander) a firm perfwasion unto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in despite. See what a strange Monster Flattery is, that can perfwade Kings to kill those that do not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude to hear the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vile Garments, and bound like a Thief; where he heard himself, and his absent Father, the greatest Captain of the World, accused, his two other Brothers, Hellor and Nicanor having been lost in in the present War. He was so greatly oppress'd with grief as for a while he could utter nothing but Tears, and sorrow had so wafted his Spirits, as he sunk under those that led him. In the end the King asked him in what Language he would make his Defence; he answered, in the same wherein it had pleas'd the King to accuse him, which he did to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might understand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, persuading the Assembly that he did disdain the Language of his own Country, and so withdrawing himself, left him to his merciless Enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King who had so sharply inveighed against him, would not vouchsafe to hear his excuse. For, not his Enemies only were embolden'd thereby against him, but all the rest having discover'd the Kings disposition and resolution, contended among themselves which of them should exceed in hatred towards him; among many other Arguments which he used in his own defence, this was not the weakest. That when Nicomachus desired to know of Dimmus what men of mark and power were his Partners in the Conspiracy (as seeming unwilling to adventure himself with mean and base Companions) Dimmus named unto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicomus, Amynias, and some others, but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the Party, and have incur'd Nicomachus. Indeed, as Philotas said well for himself, it is likely that Dimmus, thereby the better to have heard Nicomachus, would have named him, though he had never dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certain proof that he knew nothing of their intents, that practis'd against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforc'd by Torments or otherwise that could accuse him, and it is true, that adversity being seldom able to bear her own burden, is for the most part found fo malicious, as the rather desires to draw others (not always deserving it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoever it were, to avoid the extremity of reitless and unnatural Torments, devised by his profest Enemies, Craterus, Cerues, Epephorus, and others, Philotas accus'd his own self; being perswaded that they would have slain him forthwith. But he failed even in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laid on Flesh and Blood, he was forc'd to deliver, not what he knew, but whatsoever best pleas'd their ears, that were far more merciless than death it self.

Of this kind of judicial proceeding St. Augustin greatly complaineth as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountains of tears. Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur: & cum quaeritur utrum sit nocens cruciatur: & innocens luit pro incerto scelere certissimas penas: non quia illud commississe detegitur, sed quia non commississe nescitur; What shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his own Cause; and tormented whilse yet it is in question whether he be guilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault of which there is no certainty, not because he is known to have committed the Offence, but because other do not know that he hath not committed it.

It had been enough for Alexanders safety, if Philotas had been put to death without torment, the rest would not much have grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemulus, who afterward conspir'd against him, made the Kings Cruelty and delight in Blood the greatest motive of his own ill intent. Therefore Seneca speaking of Alexander, saith thus: Cruditatis nimine humanum malum est, indignum tam mist animo; ferina ipsa rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus; & abjectio homine, in feroce animal transire; Cruelty is not a humane Vice; it is unworthy of so mild a Spirit. It is even a beastly Rage to delight in Blood and Wounds, and casting away the nature of Man to become a Savage Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedy, Curcius makes a doubt, whether the Confession that Philotas made, were to give end to the Torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeed; For (saith he) in this case, they that speak truly, or they that deny falsely, come to one and the same end. Now while the Kings hands were yet wet in blood, he command'd that Lyncestes, Son-in-law to Antipater, who had been three years in Prison, should be slain: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accus'd: others there were that were suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves, that they knew no way to direct to win the Kings Favour, as by loving those whom the King favoured, they were dismiss'd. But Parmentio was yet living; Parmentio, who had serv'd with great fidelity, as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himself; Parmentio that first opened the way into Asia: That had deprest Antalus the Kings Enemy; that had always, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no less prudent in counsel, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloved of the Men of War, and so by the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the Glory and Fame he had: That he might not therefore revenge the Death of his Son, though not upon the King (for it was unlikely that he would have dishonour'd his Fidelity in his eldest Age, having now lived threefold and ten years) yet upon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had possist themselves of his Affection; it was resolv'd that he should be dispatch'd. Polydamus was employ'd in this business, a man whom of all other Parmentio trusted most, and loved best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and having Cleander and other Murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings Letters. Hic exi- Lic.
tus Parmentionis fuit, militia domique clari viri; Multa sine Rege prosperè, Rex sine illo nihil magne rei gesserat; This was the end of Parmentio (saith Curcius) who had performed many notable things: without the King, but the King without him, did never effict any thing worthy of praise.

§. XVIII.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other People. How Bessus was delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

When these things had end, Alexander went on with his Army, and brought under his obedience the Afrapians or Evergiatians; he made Amenides (sometime Darius his Secretary) their Governour; then he subdued the Arachosians, and left Memon to command over them. Here the Army, sometimes led by Parmentio, finds him, consisting of twelve thousand Macedons and Greeks, with whom he pass'd through some cold Regions with difficulty enough. At length he came to the foot of the Mountain Taurus towards the East, where he built a City which he honour'd with his own own Name, and peopled it with seven thousand of his old Macedons, worn with Age, and with travails of the War. The Arians, who since he left them were revolted, he subdued again by the industry and valour of Caramus and Erigius; And now he resolv'd to find out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus hearing of his coming, prepares to pass over the great River of Oxus which divides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabacrus is made Governour of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; the Macedonian Army suff'reth for want of Water, inasmuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, than Alexander had lost in any one Battel against the Persians. And it may well be; for (as Clytus did after object unto him) he fought against Women, not against Men, and not against their Persons, but their Shadows. He found on the Banks of this great River no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either Boats, Bridges, or Rafts, but was forc'd to fast together the Hides that cover'd his Carriages, and stuff them with Straw, and on them in six days to pass over his Army; which Bessus might easily have distrust, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army stir off. He had formerly complain'd against Darius for neglecting to defend the Banks of Tigris, and other Passages, and yet now, when this traitorous Slave had filsd himself a King, he durst not perform any thing worthy of a Slave. And therefore those that were nearst unto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanus, and others the Commanders of his Army, moved both by the care of their own safety, and by the memory of Bessus his Treason and Cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the Chain clos'd about his neck like a Mastiff Dog, and so was dragg'd along to be presented to his Enemy.

In the mean while Alexander was arriv'd at a certain Town inhabited with Greeks of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he return'd out of Greece, whose Issues had well-near forgotten their Country Language. These most cruelly (after they had received him with great joy) he put to the Sword, and destroyed their City. At this place he received Bessus, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that deliver'd him, he gave the Traitor into the hands of Oxartes, Darius his Brother, to be torment'd.

But while he now thought himself secure, some twenty thousand Mountainer assaulted his Camp; in repelling whom, he received a shot in the Leg, the Arrow-head sticking in the Fleth, so as he was carried in a Horse-Lyter, sometime by the Horsemen, sometime by the Foot.

Soon after he came unto Maracanda, which Petrus Perodinus takes to be Samarchanda, the Regal City of the great Turkmen. It had in compass threefold and ten Furlongs (Curcius saith). Here he received the Embassadors of the Scythians, (call'd Avians) who offered to serve him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stir'd to Rebellion by the same Spitamenes and Catanus, who had lately deliver'd into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Cities were revoltedly defended against him, all which, after Victory, he desaced and rased, killing all therein. At one of these he received a Blow on the Neck which struck him to the ground, and much disabled him for many days after. In the mean while Spitamenes had recover'd Maracanda, against whom he employ'd Menedemus with three thousand Foot and eight hundred Horse.

In the heat of these Tumults, Alexander march'd on, (if we may believe Curcius and others) till he came to the River of Tanaïs; upon whose Bank he built another Alexandria threefold Furlongs in compass, which he beautified with Houses within seven days after the Walls were built. The building of this City is said to have been occasion of a War between him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himself, that this new Town was fortified of purpose to keep him under. I do not well understand why the Scythians, offering War in such terrible manner, that Alexander was judg'd by his own Souldiers to counterfeite Sicknes for very fear, should nevertheless make fluit for Peace: neither find I the reason why Alexander (not intending the Conquest of those Northern Deserts, but only the defence of his own Bank) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter, and a Victory describ'd; in pursuit of which, the Macedons ran beyond the Bounds and Monuments of Bacchus his Expedition.

The truth is, that Curcius and Trogus have greatly mistaken this River which the call Tanaïs. For it was the River of Iaxartes, that runs between Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander pass'd over, while Menedemus was employ'd in the recovery of Samarchand: But Tanaïs, which divides Asia from Europe, is near two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria or Sogdiana, and the way desart and unknown. So that Alexander had (besides Iaxartes) the great River of Volga, and many others to swim over, ere he could recover Tanaïs, which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discover'd with the Army that followed him, if he had employ'd all the time that he lived in Asia in that Travail.

Wherefore it is enough to believe that the Asthetic Scythians, making some offer to disturb the Erection of this new City, which was like to give some hindrance to their excursions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensive Arms, easily chafed some ten or twelve miles, which is the substance of Curcius his Report. As for the limits of Bacchus his Journey; like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken God) went not very far into that waste Country, where he could find nothing but Trees and Stones, nor other busines than to set up a Monument.

Threefold of the Macedons are said to have been slain, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this Fight, which might easily be, in passing a great River, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian Horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Camp, and many Prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeed it is hardly possible to set down the numbers of such as perish in Battel; yet Cesar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the Victors hath been to inquire into the greatness of their own success, that Writers have been able to deliver such particulars by credible report: I hold it not unlawful to set down what we find; especially when it serves to give light to the business in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost; the omission of the number which they slew (a thing not usual in Curcius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatness of Alexander) and the little Booty that was gotten, do make it probable, that this War was no better than the repulsion of a few roving Tartars (the like being yearly performed by the Mulcovites, without any any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was assuring himself of those Scythians bordering upon Iaxartes, he received the ill news that Atandemus was slain by Spitamenes, the Army (by him killed) broken, and the greatest numbers slain, to wit, two thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse. He therefore, to appease the Rebellion, and to take revenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burns, and lays waste all before him; not sparing the innocent Children, and so departs, leaving a new Governour in that Province.

To repair this loss, he received a great supply of nineteen thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which and the old Army, he returns towards the South, and passeth the River of Oxus; on the South side whereof he built fix Towns near each other for mutual succour. But he finds a new flat-top-Rock, called Arimatez, (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers that defended against him a strong piece of Ground on the top of a high Hill; whom, when Alexander had fought in vain to win by fair words, he made choice of three hundred young men, and promised ten Talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that they could find a way to creep up to the top thereof. This they performed with the loss of some two and thirty of their Men, and then made a sign to Alexander, that they had performed his Commandment. Hereupon he sent one Copbes to persuade Arimatez to yield the Place; who, being shewed by Copbes that the Army of Macedon was already mounted up, yielded simply to Alexander's mercy, and was (with all his Kindred) scourged and crucified to death; which Punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keep good Watch in so dangerous a time. For the Place, as seems by the description, might easily have been defended against all the Armies of the World. But what strength cannot do, mans Wit, being the most forcible Engine, hath often effected; of which I will give you an example in a place of our own.

The Island of Sarke, joyning to Garnsey, and of that Government, was in Queen Maries time surprised by the French, and could never have been recovered again by strong hand, having Cattel and Corn enough upon the Place to feed for many men as will serve to defend it, and being every way so inaccessible that it might be held against the Great Turk. Yet by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this sort regained. He anchored in the Road with one Ship of small Burden, and pretending the Death of his Merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might bury their Merchant in hallowed ground, and in the Chappel of that Isle; offering a Present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they should not come ashore with any Weapon, no nor so much as with a Knife) the French men yielded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead Carkass, but with Swords, Targets and Harquebusses. The French received them at their landing, and searching every of them so narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gave them leave to draw their Coffin up the Rocks with great difficulty; some part of the French took the Flemish Boat and rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the Commodities promised, and what else they pleased, but being entred, they were taken and bound.

The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappel, shut the door to them, and taking their Weapons out of the Coffin set upon the French; they run to the Cliff and cry to their Company aboard the Flemings to come to their Succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings yielded themselves and the Place. Thus a Fox Tail doth sometimes help well to peece out the Lyons Skin, that else would be too short.

§. XIX.

How Alexander slew his own Friends.

AFTER these Sogdian and Scythian Wars, we read of Alexander's killing of a Lyon, and other frivolous matter, and that he committed the government of Macedonia, and the Country about it to Clytus, and how he slew him soon after, for valuing the Virtue of Philip the Father before that of Alexander the Son, or rather because he objected to the King the Death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammon, for therein he rought him to the quick, the same being delivered in publick, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed had deserved as much at the Kings hands as any man living had done, and had in particular saved his Life, which the King well remembered when he came to himself, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his Insolency was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgot whom he offended, so the King in his (for neither of them were themselves) forgot whom he went about to slay, for the grief whereof, he tore his own Face and forrowed so inordinately, as, but for the persuasions of Calisthenes, it is thought he would have slain himself.

Wine begat Fury, Fury matter of repentance; but, preceding Mischiefs are not attended by succeeding Bewailings. Omne vitium ebrietas et cecitas; et deiecit; obstantem malis conatibus verendum removere; nisi possidet animum navis: vitis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facis ebrietas vitis, sed perarbit. Drunkenness both kindles and lays open every Vice; it removes out of the way that stone which groves impediment unto bad attempts; where Wine gets the Mastery, all the ill that before lay hidden breaks out: Drunkenness indeed rather discovers Vices, than makes them.

Soon after this, Spitamenes, who slew Belissus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his Head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans also seized upon his Fellow Conspirator Datisaphernes, and delivered him up. So Alexander being now freed from all these petty Rebels, disposed of the Provinces which he hath over, and went on with his Army into Gabazae, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storm, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Train. From hence he invaded the Sacans, and destroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territory of Cobortanes, who submitted himself unto him, feasted him greedily, and presented him with thirty beautiful Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one; which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst use any freedom of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, having so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men.

In the mean while he would needs be honoured as a God: whereto that he might allure the Macedonians, he employed two pernicious Parasites, Hages and Cleo, whom Calisthenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments used to the Assembly, he told Cleo, That he thought that Alexander would disdain the gift of God-head from his Vassals; that the Opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometimes follow the Death of those who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it never accompanied any one as yet living in the World. He further told him, That neither Heracles nor Bacchus were Deified at a Banquet, and upon drink (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carousing Feast) but that, for the more than many acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbered among the Gods. Alexander stood behind a Partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunity to be revenged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a lover of the Kings Honour, was yet soon after tormented to Death, not for that he had betrayed the King to others, but because he never would consent to betray the King to himself, as all his detestable Flatterers did. For in a Conspiracy against the King, made by one Hermolus and others (which they confess) he caught Calisthenes without Confession, Accusation, or Trial, to be torn asunder upon the Rack: This deed, unworthy of a King, Seneca thus censures. Hec est Alexandri crimen aeternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum felicitas redimet. Nam quatenus, quia dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa milia: opprobrum; et Calisthenem: Quatenus dictum erit, Occidit Darium: opprobrum; et Calisthenem. Quatenus dictum erit omnia Oceano tenuis vixit, ipsum quoque tentavit novis elapsus, et Imperium ex angulo Thraciae usque ad Orientis terminos protulit: dicitur, sed Calisthenem occidit. Omnia laetis antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transferat, ex his quae fecit nihil tam magnū erit, quam felix Calisthenes; This is the eternal Crime of Alexander, which no Virtue nor Felicity of his in War shall ever be able to redeem. For as often as any man shall say, He slew many thousand Persians, it shall be replied, He did so, and he slew Calisthenes. When it shall be said, He slew Darius, it shall be replied, and Calisthenes. When it shall be said, He won all as far as to the very Ocean, thereon also he be adorned with unusual Navies, and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace to the utmost Bounds of the Orient, it shall be said without, but he killed Calisthenes. Let him have outcome all the ancient examples of Captains and Kings, none of all his Acts makes so much to his Glory, as Calisthenes to his Reproach.

§. XX.

Of Alexander's Journey into India. The Battle between him and Porus.

WHEN the Army before remembered, of one hundred and twenty thousand Foot and Horse, Alexander did enter the Borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves unto him he entertained lovingly, the rest he constrained; killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa, built by Bacchus, which after a few days was rendered unto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate Fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made Feasts for ten days together. Now when he had drunk his fill, he went on towards Dedada, and thence to Acadera, Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, Victuals failing, he divides his Army: Ptolemy led one part, Cann another, and himself the rest. They take many Towns, whereof that of greatest fame was Masage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded unto him by Cleopha the Queen, to whom again he restored it; at the Siege of this City he received a Wound in the Leg. After this Nova was taken by Polyperchon, and a Rock of great strength by himself: he won also a Passage upon one Eryx, who was slain by his Company, and his Head presented to Alexander. This is the sum of Alexander's doings in those parts, before such time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Coming to Indus he found there Ephesius, who (being sent before) had prepared Boats for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexander's arrival, had persuaded Ombis, King of that part of the Country, to submit himself to this great Conqueror. Therefore, soon upon Alexander's coming, Ombis presented himself with all the strength of his Country, and fix and fifty Elephants unto him, offering him his Service and Assistance. He made Alexander know that he was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus, wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this Division to make his own Victory by far the more easy. He presented Alexander with a Crown of Gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withal fourscore Talents of silver Coin, which Alexander not only refused, but to shew that he was covetous of Glory, not of Gold, he gave Ombis a thousand Talents of his own Treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares having heard that Alexander had received his Enemy Ombis into his Protection, resolved to make his own Peace also: For knowing that his own strength did but equal that of Ombis, and that there was no other difference between them, than that which the Chance of War gave, he thought it an ill March when Alexander, who had already beaten under foot all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himself a Parry and Head of the Quarrel. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a Commandment, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdom, there to do him Homage. But from Porus he received this manly answer, That he would fain see him in his first Demand, which was to attend him on his Borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other Acknowledgment he was resolved to take counsel of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to pass over the River Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his own Home. Porus attends him on the farther Bank with thirty thousand Foot, fourscore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great Troop of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely staid somewhat longer ere he had seen India. The River was four Furlongs broad, which makes half a Mile, and withal deep and swift. It had in it many Islands, among which there was one well shadowed with Wood, and of good capacity. Alexander sent Ptolemy up the River with a great part of the Army, throwing the rest from the view of Porus, who by this device being drawn from his first incamping, fers himself down opposite to Ptolemy, supposing that the whole Army of Macedon meant to force their Passage there. In the mean while Alexander recovers the farther Shore without resistance. He orders his Troups, and advanceth towards Perna, who at first rather believes that Abisares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of Fortune) had been come over Hydaspes to his aid, than that Alexander had pass'd it. But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Heges with four thousand Horle, and a hundred armed Waggon to entertain him. Each Waggon had in it four to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little use: for there had fallen so much rain, and thereby the Fields were so moistened, as the Horles could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dahans had the Vanguard, who so galled these Indians, as they brake their Reins, and other Furniture, over-turning the Waggon and those in them. Perdiccas also gave out the Indian Horle-men, and the one and the other were forc'd to recoil. Porus moves forward with the grofs of his Army, that those of his Vanguard feared might recover his Rear: Alexander, being followed with Ephestion, Platamus, and Perdiccas, took him on to charge the Indian Horle-men on the left wing, commanding Cennus or Cerus to invade the right; Antigenes and Leontatus, he directed to brake upon Porus his battel of Foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himself being carried upon one of them of the greatest stature. By these Beasts the Macedonian Foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters, being well guarded with the long and strong Pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head and ran over the Foot that followed them. In the end, and after a long and doubtful Fight, by the advantage of Weapon, and by the courage and skillfulness of the Macedonian Captains, the Victory fell to Alexander, who also far exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Eastern and Northern Nations, Porus was assisted by his own Confederate and Country People. Yet for his own Person he never gave ground otherwise than with his Sword towards his Enemies, till being weakened with many Wounds, and abandoned by his Army, he became a Prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom again he received his Estate with a great enlargement.

How Alexander finished his Expedition, and returned out of India.

I Forbear to trouble my self and others with a frivolous discourse of Serpents, Apes, and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these Travels: or of those petty Wars which Alexander made between the overthrow of Porus, and his falling down the River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better known unto us in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The Magnificence and Riches of those Kings we could in no sort be persuaded to believe, till our own experience had taught us, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seen between London and Stanes.

Our great Traveller Mandeville, who died in the Year 1372. and had seen so much of the World, and of the East India, we accounted the greatest tabor of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witness the Monument made of him in the Covert of the Friars Guilmins in Legge, where the Religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Excellence; For an honourable memory of his Excellency, faith Guichardin.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradrus, Acefines, and the rest, fall into the main Stream, are now possess'd by the great Mogor, the Ninth from Tamberlain, who commands all that tract between Perfia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Country towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Acefion, a Ship of London, suffered Shipwrack in the Year 1609. and some of the Company travelled over Land till they came to Agra, the fame great City (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Phylastratus in the Life of Apollonius Tynemus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells us, that those two great Captains (whom Alexander fought by all means to out-lame) when they endeavour'd to subdue unto them the Oxydrace, a People inhabiting between the Rivers of Hydaspis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their Cities with Thunder and Lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordinance that those People had then in use. For it is now certainly known, that the great Kings of the uttermost East, have had the use of the Cannon, many hundreds of years since, and even since their first civility and greatness, which was long before Alexander's time. But Alexander pierc'd not so far into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Army, he discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, inform'd him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River of Ganges, was the powerfulst King of all those Regions; and that he was able to bring into the Field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horle, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflam'd than ever to proceed in this Discovery and Conquest, yet all the Art he had could not persuade the Soldiers to wander over those great Deserts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible unto them than the greatest Army that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many persuasive Orations, to follow him towards the South to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was near at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, devised a pretty trick, where-with he hoped to beguile Possibility, and make himself seem greater than he was. He enlarged his Camp, made greater Trenches, greater Cabins for the Soldiers, greater Horle-stalls, and higher Mangers than his Horles could feed in. He caus'd all Furniture of Men and Horles to be made larger than would serve for use; and scattered these Armour and Bridles about his Camp, to be kept as Reliques, and wonder'd at by the Savages. Proportionable to these, he rais'd up twelve great Altars to be the Monument of his Journeys end. This was a ready way to increase the fame of his bigness; to his greatness it could add nothing save a suspicion that it was less than is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned again to the bank of Acefines, and there determin'd to set up his Fleet where Acefines and Hydaspis encounter, where to reitiffie by a surer Monument, how far he had pass'd towards the East, he built by those Rivers two Cities; the one he call'd Nicea, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horle Bucephalus. Here again he received a fourth supply of six thousand Thracian Horle-men, seven thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon five and twenty thousand Armour, garnish'd with Silver and Gold, which he distributed among his Soldiers. About these Rivers he wain many Towns, and committed great slaughter on those that resist'd: It is then written of him, that assaulting a City of the Oxydracans, he leapt from the top of the Wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; he slew like those of Bevis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, he pass'd down the River with his Fleet, at which time also the news came unto him of a Rebellion in Babylonia, and then of the arrival of an hundred Embassadors from a King of India, who humbled himself unto him. He feasted these Embassadors upon a hundred Bids of Gold, with all the sumptuousity that could be devised, who soon after their dispatch returned again with a Present of three hundred Horle, one hundred and thirty Waggon, and to each four Horles, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their Entertainments ended, he sail'd towards the South, pass'd through many obscure Nations, which did all yield unto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he build'd another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned Swords, with one of which Pholomy (afterward King of Aegypt) was wounded, and cured by an Herb which Alexander dreamt that he had seen in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came near the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the Tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden, flustled one upon another by the Flood, so on the Ebb they were left on the dry ground, and on the sandy banks of the River, where-with the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few days observed well the course of the Sea, he pass'd out of the Rivers Mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Nephtun, returned: and the better to inform himself, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the Coast towards the Mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus, in the beginning of his sixth Book hath written this passage down the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were used therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

Near the out-lets of this River he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteen days march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Army suffered such misery for want of Food, that of a hundred and twenty thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horle, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned alive.

§. XXII.

Of Alexander's Riot, Cruelty, and Death.

From Gedrosia Alexander led his Army into Carmania, and so drawing near to Perfia, he gave himself wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the Triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish Vice being hateful enough in it self, yet it always inflam'd this King to Cruelty. For (saith Curcius) the Hangman followed the Feast, for Alpaltus, one of his Provincial Governors, be commanded to be slain; so as neither did the excess of Volutucry qualify his Cruelty, nor his Cruelty binder in curb his Volutucry.

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of five thousand Foot, and a thousand Horle, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had been employed in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Provinces in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was persuaded, that, had they not altogether despair'd of his return out of India, they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembering the virtue of him whom they had slaughtered. The ord was, That Cleander and the other Chief, with fix hundred Soldiers by them employed, were deliver'd over to the Hang-man: every one rejoicing that the Ice of the King was at last executed on the Ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the Coast, and made report of an Island rich in Gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commended to make some farther Discovery: which done, that they should enter the Mouth of Euphrates, and find the King at Babylonia.

As he drew near to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now call'd Chiligras, where he was presented with many rich Gifts by different Orfmes, one of the Princes of Perfia, of the race descended of Cyrus. But because Babylonia, an Emmet in especial favour with the King, was neglected, he not only practis'd certain loose Fellows to visit against Orfmes, that he had robbed Cyrus's his Tomb, for which he was condemn'd to die; but he assisted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caus'd Phradatus to be slain; suspecting his greatness. Capere (saith Curcius) esse propter ad reprehendenda supplicia, item ad deterrendo crimina: He began bind longly to lead bound, and to believe false reports. It is true, that he took a way to make all men weary of his Government, seeing Cruelty is more fearful than all the adventures that can be made against it.

At this time it is said that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himself, when he had lived three score and thirteen years. Whether herein he followed the custom of his Country, being an Indian, or sought to prevent the grief and incommodity of elder age, it is uncertain: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-thewing Alexander's death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada he came to Susa, where he Married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giving her younger Sister to his beloved Ephestion, and four younger other Persian Ladies to his Captains. There were six thousand Guests invited to the Feast, to each of which he gave a Cup of Gold. Here there came unto him three thousand young Soldiers out of his conquered Provinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, having lavishly consumed the Monies in his keeping, got him going with five thousand Talents, and six thousand hired Soldiers, but he was rejected in Greece, and there slain. Alexander greatly rejoiced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these Forces and Treasures could not stir: yet he sent commandment that they should again receive their banished men, whereunto (fearful of his indignation) all submitted themselves, (except the Athenians) though they relolv'd that it was a manifest preparation towards their Bondage. After this, there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had relolv'd to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the Travel of War, and to keep the rest in Asia. Hufed many Orations to fasciate them, but it was in vain during the Tempest of their Fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawn to the Land with a twine thread, when they have tumbled a while, so are the unconfidant multitude easily conducted when their first Passions are evaporate. With such as were licensed to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gave the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his absence, discharged the trust committed unto him with great fidelity, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly, if Alexander had not taken counsel of his Cup, he would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a stronger reason for his remove, than to have employed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the War being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remove, but the Kings disposition to lend him after Parthia, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, do not stand in doubt of every man ill-affected, though valiant; but there is a kind of Kingly courage, compounded of hardiness and undaunting, which is many times so fearful unto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After he had sent for Antipater, he made a Journey into Media to settle things there; where Ephistemon, whom he favoured most of all men, died. The King, according to the greatness of his love, laments his loss; hangs his Physician, and bestows upon his Monument twelve thousand Talents: After which he returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himself, but to free himself. For if we believe Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gain-say) Antipater, by his Sons, Cassander, Philip, and Tella, who waited on Alexander's Cup, gave him Poison, Thesphalus (who was of the Conspiracy) having invited him to a drinking Feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his Cup, a draught of drink stronger than Hercules himself, he quitted the World within a few days.

Certainly the Princes of the World have seldom found good by making their Ministers over-great, and thereby suspicious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelity to be a debt, but is perfwaded that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassals, will never please himself with the price given. The only restorative, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodness and verue of the Prince, and his Liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be observed. It may be that Antipater, having commanded two or three Kingdoms twelve years, knew not now how to play any other part; no more than Cæsar did, after he had so long a time governed the Gauls, where he utterly forgot the Art of Obedience. A most cruel and ungrateful Traytor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure upon his remove (the Tragedies of Parthia, Cyprus, and Callisthenes, having been so lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had resolved to have given him some other great Government in Asia: the old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance desired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former War.

§. XXIII. Of Alexander's Person and Qualities.

Howsoever it were, Alexander's former cruelties cannot be excused, no more than his vanity to be esteemed the Son of Jupiter, with his excessive delight in drink and drunkenness, which others make the cause of his Fever and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what he thought do when he had conquered the World, Augustus Cæsar found just cause to deride him, as if the well governing of so many Nations and Kingdoms, as he had already conquered, could not have offered him matter more than abundant, to buse his brains withal. That he was both learned, and a lover of Learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first Book of the advancement of Learning, hath proved it sufficiently. His Liberality I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gave a whole City to one of his Servants, He, to whom it was given, did out of modesty refuse it, as disproportionate to his Fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept; but the King to give: of which Seneca; *Amintia vox vi-detur & regia, cum sit fidelissima. Nihil enim per se quingnam decet. Refert quid, cui; quando; quare; ubi, &c. sine quibus facti rationum confabrit; habetur personarum & dignitatum proportio; & item fit ubique virtutum modus, æque peccat quod excedit; quam quod deficit; it seems a brave and Royal speech; whereto indeed it is very foolish: For nothing simply considered by it self bestems a man: We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations no act can be approved. Let Homer be proportioned unto the Persons; for whereto virtue is ever limited by measure, the excess is as fault as the defect.*

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it felt: not much to be admired; For I am told that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himself. Surely, if adventurous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that verue with the hardiness of Thieves, Ruffians, and Mastiff Dogges. For certainly it is no way praise-worthy but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawful enterprises, in which we are employed for the service of our Kings and Common-weals.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other Troublers of the World, who have bought their glory with so great destruction, and effusion of Blood, I think him far inferior to Cæsar, and many other that lived after him, seeing he never undertook any Warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted, nor was ever encountered with any Army of which he had not a most mastering advantage; both of Weapons and of Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captains by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seemeth, Fortune and Destinies (if we may use those terms) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his own, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their Necks to the Yoke, and Kingdoms that invited and called in their own Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Son, gives this judgment of them. Quod non minus fuerit periculum quam inundatio, quia planum omne periculum est, quam conflagratio quia magnus pars animantium exurit; That they were no less plagues to mankind, than an overflow of Waters, drowning all the level; or some burning drought, whereby a great part of living Creatures is scorched up.

CHAP. III.

The Reign of ARIDÆUS.

§. I.

Of the Question about Succession to Alexander.

THE death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, having lost his only Eye. For, that which is reported in Fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance inefficual, and harmful chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (under the Divine Ordinance) were, partly the uncertainty of Title to Succession in the Kingdom of Macedon, partly the stubborn Pride of Alexander himself, who thinking none worthy to be his Heir, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving every one to his own Fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soon taught unto spirits reflecting upon their own worth, when the reverence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly been shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) Governing in Macedon as Protector, assumed unto himself the Kingdom, not rendering it unto Amintas, (the Son of his elder Brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing upon him in Marriage a Daughter of his own: by which bond, and much more by his proper strength, he assured the Crown unto himself: Amintas never attempting ought against Philip, though (with price of his life) he did against Alexander in the beginning of his Reign. Wherefore Eurydice, the sole Issue of his Marriage, ought in reason to have been acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as having better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, unless (peradventure) some Law of that Nation forbid the Reign of Women. But the excellent verue of those two Princes had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their own bodies: and so great were their Conquests, that Macedon it self was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserving to be laid in balance against the demand of their Posterity, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royal Seat.

Alexander having taken many Wives, had Issue by none of the principal of them. Bastine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian, had born unto him a young Son: and Roxane, the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnly Married) was left by him great with Child. But the baseness of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alledged in Bar of the Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) have wrought out their own ends, under the name of Alexander's Children.

Cleopatra, the Sister of Alexander, Widdow to the King of Egyptus, and Aridæus his base Brother (Son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had Married the Lady Eurydice before mantioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may give suspicion, that either Law or Custom had made that Sex incapable of the Sovereignty; Aridæus (besides his Bastardy) was neither for Person nor Quality fit to Rule as King; yet upon him the Election fell, but slowly, and (as happened often) for lack of a better: when the Counsellors having over-laboured their disagreeing will in devising what was best, were content for very weariness to take what came next to hand.

Proton (soon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the half-Persian brood, King Alexander's Children, was of opinion, that the Rule of all should be given to the Captains, that going for Law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so far was he from acknowledging any one as true Heir to the Crown.

This Proton was called the Son of Lagus, but repud of Philip: who having used the company of Antiochus Proton's Mother, delivered her in Marriage to Lagus, being great with Child. Therefore, whether it were so, that he hoped well to work his own fortune out of those differences, which are incident unto the consultations of many ambitious men, equal in place, forcing them at length to reduce their quiet with subjection to one, deservin regard by his Blood, and trust for his even carriage; or whether he desired only to get a share to himself, which could not have come to pass had all been given to one: plain enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridæus before himself; and therefore gave such counsel as fired his own and other mens purposes. Yea, this device of his took place indeed, though not in form as he had propounded it. For, it was in effect all one, to have assembled at Alexander's empty Chair, as Proton had conceived the form of their consultations, or to let in the Chair such a King as Aridæus, no wiser than the Chair it self. Alio the controversies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captains; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfeit shews of dissembling aspirers, do often take check by the plain dealing of them, who dare to go more directly to work: so was it like to have failed with Proton and the rest, when Antiochus, another of the Captains, interpreted the words of Alexander; saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he delivered his Ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be disposed of his own purchases; and those tokens of Alexander's purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose another construction: every one being uncertain how the secret affections of thers might be undined. Many therefore, either out of their love, or because they would not be of the latest, urged urged Perdiccas to take upon him the Estate Royal. He was no stranger to the Royal Blood; yet his Birth gave him not much Reputation, as the great Favour of his dead King, with whom he had been very inward, and that especially fining the Death of Ephelion (a powerful Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth might well be commended, as a good man of War; and one that had given much proof of his private Valour. But very furly he was: which quality (joined with good Fortune) carried a shew of Majesty: being checkt with misadventure, it was called by a true Name Pride; and rewarded with Death.

In the present business, as it had been great happiness to have succeeded Alexander. For not content to have the Acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the Sentence of Aridæus, he would needs counterfeite Modesty; thinking that every one of the Princes would have envied him, which would be the less envious, the more solemnity he used in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that feigneth himself a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolf. Melager, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) took advantage of his irresolute Behaviour, and very bitterly inveighed against him. In conclusion he pronounced, that whosoever was Heir to the Crown, the Souldiers ought to be Heirs to the Treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing flow, to share it. This disturbed all the Constidation. The Captains were left alone, far enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedy of spoyl thronged about Melager.

§. II.

The election of Aridæus, with the Troubles thereabout arising; the first division of the Empire.

DURING this uproar, mention was made of Aridæus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, until at last it grew to the voice of the Army. Melager having withdrawn himself tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so fair an occasion to make himself great: therefore he produced Aridæus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers Name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, investing him in Alexander's Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this Election, but in vain; for they could not resolve what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Pythion, a hor-headed man, took upon him to proclaim the Son of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsel which Perdiccas at first had given, appointing Perdiccas and Leontas his Protectors. But this Child was not yet born, which made that attempt of Pythion vain. Finally, Perdiccas with six hundred men, and Pholomy with the King's Pages, took upon them to defend the place where Alexander's body lay: but the Army conducted by Melager, who carried the new King about whether he lifted, easily brake in upon them, and informed them to accept Aridæus for their Sovereign Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captains, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leontas who was of the Royal Blood, a goodly

Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the Horfe, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing upon his Guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any Commotion, that should happen among the Infantry. The King (who was governed by Melager) commanded or gave leave to have Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure Executioners. Their coming was not unexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such gravity, that they departed honest rather than came; being sorry of their bad Enterprize. Upon the news of this Attempt the Camp was in an uproar, which the King seeking to pacify, wanted Authority, as having newly got the Crown by them, and holding it by their courtesy. The matter it self afforded no good excuses, and his indiction made them worse. He said that no harm was done, for Perdiccas was alive: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprize, which he imputed to Melager; abandoning the furest of his friends, to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, until the King by offering to resign his Estate unto them, renewed out of their piety that favourable affection, which had moved them to set him up at the first.

Perdiccas having now joyed himself with Leontas, kept the Fields, intending to cut off all provision of Victuals from the City. But after sundry Embassies passing between the King and the Nobles; they requiring to have the Authors of Sedition given up into their hands: the King, that Melager might be joyned with Leontas and Perdiccas, as a Third in government of the Army) things were compounded according to the King's desire. Melager should have done well to consider, that such men as had one day demanded his Head, were not like the day following to give him a principal Place among them, without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of Treachery lurked under their great facility. General peace was renewed, and much love protected where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had been in Alexander's time: but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windy spirits they were which moved in the Arteries. False Reports were given out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his own disgrace, but in such terms as might seem to have proceeded from Melager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, took it as an injury done to himself; and (as desirous of a true Friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such Authors of Discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a lover of Peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a general Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers of lending) in presence of the Army. The Plot was mischievously laid: Had Melager given way to sedition Rumours, he must needs have incurred the general hatred of all, as a fower of dissention; and thereby with publick approbation might have been cut off, as having often offended in that kind: his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now seeking redress of these Disorders, he hastened his own ruine, by a less formal, but more speedy way. This kind of Muster was very solemn, and practised with many Ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Army. The Horfe-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian Foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their quality set in array, apart from others, as if they had been of sundry sorts, met at advent-

ture: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to direction of their several Captains. But at that time the great Barrels of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Melager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the Horfe and Elephants beginning to give charge upon them, was such, as discovered no lessing paltime nor good intent. Kings were always wont to fight among the Horfe-men: of which custom Perdiccas made great use that day, to the utter confusion of his Enemies. For Aridæus was always governed by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three days before he had fought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Melager: now he rides with Perdiccas up and down about the Foot-men, commanding them to deliver unto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast unto the Elephants, and by them slain, in the presence of the King who should have defended them, and of their affrighted Companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Melager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first Constidation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especial Friends. Having therefore kept himself quiet a while, as unwilling to give offence to them which had the advantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and flew him.

The Army being thus corrected, was led into the City, where a new Council of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leaving to Aridæus the office of a Vizier, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the Forces remaining with him. Then were the Funerals of Alexander thought upon; whose Body having been seven days neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no sign of poyson appearing, how greatsoever the suspicion might be. The charge of his Burial was committed to Aridæus: one of the Captains, who was two years preparing of a great and costly Shew, making a stately Chariot in which the Corps was laid; many Coarces of his Friends being laid in the ground, before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his own building in Egypt.

§. III.

The beginning of the Laman War.

WHILE these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principal Noble-men, and inferior to none of Alexander's Followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were banished in Greece with a War, which the Abians more bravely than wisely had begun in Alexander's Life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, upon the courage which they had taken by his Death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greeks (few excepted) should be restored unto their former Places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Estates, and therefore thought fit to provide, that in every City he would have a sure Party. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he won by this proud Intjunction. His pleasure indeed was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open Tyranny. The Abians greatly decayed in Estate, but retaining more than was needful, of their ancient spirits, forbade the execution of this Decree in their Dominions; so did also the Abians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them took Arms, but seemed to bear themselves, as men that had done no more than they might well justify by Reason: nevertheless to prevent the worst, the Abians gave secret Instructions to Loebenes a Captain of theirs, willing him to levy an Army, but in his own Name, and to keep it in a readiness for their use. This was no hard thing for Loebenes to do: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian War in poor estate, as defrauded of their Pay by the Captains. Of these he gathered up eight thousand, when the certain News were brought of Alexander's Death: at which time the City of Athen declared it self, and more honourably than wisely, proclaimed open War against the Macedonians, for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Loebenes drew in the Abians, and some other Estates, gave Battle to the Bactrians, who sided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing to fall in Reputation, and so strong in Adherents, that Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his own strength) was fain to fend into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vain than the fears and hopes of men, thurning or pursuing their desires at off, which deserve all moral wisdom, even when they seem near at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burdened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon; which he then feared as Death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his Life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured unto him, was sent into Macedon to convey home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succeed Antipater in the government of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that he had a privy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published, found much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent unto the King, as Captain of the young Souldiers, newly to be levied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes give out speeches justifying his own jealousy and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruel Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexander's Lieutenants had escaped with Life: most of them indeed were mean persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian Expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the King's rigor was such, as could find rebellious purposes (for he interpreted even lewd government) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who having fate Victory ten years in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the envy of a Court, wherein they had been his inferiors, which would now repine to see him their equal. Therefore whether his fear drew him to prevention, working first the King's Death by poyson, given by his Son Isolus, Alexander's Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth until opportunity had changed it into the passion of Revenge, which was cruelly performed by his Son Cassander: great cause of much fear he had, which I note in this place as the ground of effects to be produced in very few years.

At

At the present Craterus was lying near, and all the Captains of Companies being sent for, solicited to make haste. Not without cause. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteen thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse; which Mistur was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being emptied into Asia. The Theffalians indeed who had long stood firm for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best Horse-men of Greece, furnished him with very brave Troops, that might have done great service, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With these Forces did Antipater in Theffaly try the fortune of a Battle with Leophanes; rather (as may seem) fearing the increase of his Enemies power and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checked at the first) than presuming on his own strength. For Leophanes had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercenaries, two and twenty thousand Foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians: of Horse he brought into the Field about two thousand and five hundred; but over-strong he was that way also, when once the Theffalians had revolted unto him. So Antipater lost the day: and his loss was such, that he neither was able to keep the Field, nor to make a safe retreat into his own Country: therefore he fled into the Town of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessary to bear out a Siege. Thicker did Leophanes follow him, present him Battle again, and upon the refusal close up the Town with Earth-works, and a Wall. There will we leave him for a while, travelling in the last honourable Enterprize that ever was undertaken by that great City of Athenians.

§. IV.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

King Ardenas living under the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his own Province, kept a naked Court: all his greatness consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make use of him. Perdiccas had no Province of his own peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his Government. A stronger Army than any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that unsettled condition of things to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the Marriage of Cleopatra, the Sister of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Nicea the Daughter of Antipater, or made such love to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his designs.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that Name, and tenth King of that Country, had continued faithful to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his Forefathers, even from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Artilla Sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had (indeed) been oppressed by the Persians; but what Fortune took from them at one time, Virtue restored at another, and their faithful Princes had much increased all. But now in the fatal period of to great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slain) with sufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persian form. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with greater cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater business wherein to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take in that in-land Kingdom, surrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian Conquest, and for his own particular to have one opportune place of free retreat, under the government of a steadfast Friend. Therefore he entered Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the Field thirty thousand Foot, and fifteen thousand Horse (a strong Army, had it not encountered a stronger, and better trained) won the Victory, and thereby the whole Kingdom. But with much cruelty did he use the Victory: for having taken Ariarathes Prisoner with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light upon: and so delivered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trusted most.

Another part of his Forces he had committed to Pythion; rather as to the most honourable of such as remained about him, than as to the most afflicted. Pythion was to subdue the Greeks, rebelling in the high Countreys of Asia. Above twenty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous Nations, were full weary of their unpleasant Habitations, and the rude People, among whom they lived: and therefore took advantage of the present Troubles to seek unto themselves a better Fortune. Against these Pythion went, more desirous to make them his own, than to destroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas discovering, did both give him in charge to put all those Rebels to the Sword, giving the spoils of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoined it unto Pythion's Captains (his own Creatures) that they should see this Command executed. These Directions for use of the Victory might have proved needful; so uncertain was the Victory itself. A Captain of the Rebels commanding over three thousand, corrupted by Pythion, did in the heat of the Fight (which was very doubtful) retire without necessity to a Hill not far off. This dismayed the rest, and gave the day to Pythion: who being far enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting unto them their Lives and Liberty, under condition of laying down their Arms; and hereupon he gave them his faith. Being Master of these Companies, he might well have a good opinion of his own Power: all Power being then valued by strength in Followers, when as none could vaunt himself as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteen thousand Foot, and eight thousand eight hundred Horse, besides these new Companions, whom needless fear without great loss had caused to leave the Field: but in true estimation, all the greatness whereof Pythion might think himself assured, was (and soon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand Foot, and eight thousand Horse, of those which followed Pythion, levied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the Letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoined to give assistance to that business: and by virtue of the Precept given unto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poor men who had yielded themselves; leaving Pythion as naked as he came forth to return unto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mighty above the mighty, and had fair leisure to pursue his hopes of Marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himself Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for fear of opposition. How it succeeded will appear, when the Lamian War taketh ending.

§. V.

§. V.

The process of the Lamian War.

WE left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting means to free himself without Succours from his Friends in Asia. Those Helps not appearing so soon as he expected, he came to parley with Leophanes, and would have yielded unto any terms of Reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of Victory do seldom limit their Desires. Leophanes would him without further circumstance to submit himself to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded over them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the Extremities, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Town, which felt great want of Victuals. In this fighting War, the Ætolians (whether weary of lingering still at a Siege, or having business which they pretended at home) took their leave, and re-they returned into their own Country. Their departure left the Trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found means to fallly out upon his Enemies to their great loss: for many were slain, and Leophanes himself among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Town. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved; their Victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deal with the Greeks in open Fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lysimachus who was nearest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own, leading no more than four thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, against Seuthas their King, who brought into the Field above four times that number; and though Lysimachus not without loss had gotten one Victory, yet the Enemy abounding in multitude felt not the Blow so much as might abate his Courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly solicited by Antipater's Friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the government of Phrygia the less, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand five hundred Horse, whether levied out of his Province, or appointed unto him out of the main Army, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the Journey into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chief City of Macedon, and very kindly offering her self to be his Wife; which Letters he kept not so close as had been requisite, and therefore brought himself into great suspicion, that soon ended with his Life. Antipholus, chosen General by the Athenians in place of Leophanes, hearing of his approach, forsook the Siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to give them an evil welcome home, before Antipater and they should joyn in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the advantage of Leonatus in Horse, by the odds of two thousand Theffalians; in other things he was equal to him; in cause he thought himself superior; in the fortune of that day he proved so: for he won a great Victory (chiefly by virtue of the end of Leonatus himself; who fighting valiantly was driven into a marshy piece of ground, where he found his Death, which desperately he had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home not far from the place of his Nativity. He was the first of Alexander's Captains which died in Barrel, but all, or most of the rest, shall follow him the same way. After this day the Athenians did never any thing fuitable to their ancient glory. The vanquished Macedonians were too weak to renew the Fight, and too proud to fly. They betook themselves to high grounds, unfit for service on Horse-back, and so abode in fight of the Enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their Camp, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the Enemy should increase, did earnestly seek to determine the matter quickly by another Barrel. But full Antipater kept himself on ground of advantage: which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the Enemy to be vanquished. This wretchedness (incorrigible in an Army of Voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the Victories by Land were much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to have made themselves once again Masters, were put to the work.

But now the fatal Captivity of Greece came on, of which the never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a strong Army having made great Marches from Cilicia, passed over into Europe, and coming into Theffaly joyned himself with Antipater. The Forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being joyned in one, contained forty thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand Horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in Horse, in Foot eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antipholus labour to avoid the necessity of a Barrel, until such time as the Towns considerable should return unto the Camp those Bands which had straggled from it. But those Companies were so slow in coming, and Antipater so urgent upon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the Victory: for the Theffalians had the upper hand, and held it, until such time as they perceived their Barrels (overlaid with multitude) retire unto the higher grounds, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the Field, having little else to boast of, considering that with the loss of a hundred and thirty men, they had purchased only the death of some five hundred Enemies. Yet hereof was great use made. For the Greeks, as never subject unto the full Command of one General, and being every one desirous to preserve his own Estate, and City, concluded to make a Treaty of Peace with Antipater; who being at a subtil Artificer, and well understanding their aptness to division, refused to hearken to any general composition, but would every City to deal apart for it self. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was rejected; the Greeks choosing rather to abide the coming of their Assailants, whose unreasonable carelessness betrayed the Cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Towns in Theffaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other men unlikely hopes, with their own assured and present Calamity.

§. VI.

Of the Peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demosthenes his Death.

THE Thessalians falling off, all the rest soon followed feverally, and sued for Peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inviting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having been Authors of this Tumult; and their fear was not great; the Seat of the War being far from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their Imaginations; who fate still at Athens, devoting upon courses of prosecuting the War to come, which came to their doors, before their Confultation could find issue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartless as friends. All that remained was to send Embassadors desiring Peace upon some good terms: necessity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chief of this Embassy; Phocion as the most honourable; Demades as a strong Persuader (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for Wisdom, Gravity of Manners, and Virtue; but all these Ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of less regard, when their admiration was to cost much in real effects.

Antipater calling to mind the Pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to de-fray the Charges of the War past, to pay a Fine, and entertain a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the Popular Estate, committing the Government of the City to those of most Wealth, depriving of the Right of Suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of Riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retain the Name and form of a Democracy. But the rascal Multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to get their Livings out of the common Troubles, being now debarred from hearing Offices and giving their Voices, cried out that this was a mean Oligarchy, the violent Usurpation of a few inchoating upon the publick Right. These turbulent Fellows (of whom King Philip had been wont to say, That War to them was Peace, and Peace War) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gave them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withal for satisfying his own suspicions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to be slain. Had the Death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, been forborn, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have passed for very mild: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or have surrendered their Judgments to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speak and write, condemn him utterly, calling him a bloody Tyrant. Such Grace and Reputation do the learned Arts find in all civil Nations, that the evil done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soever otherwise it be or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had been Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) find him, and gently perswade him to leave the place, but not to prevailing he threatened violence. Then Demosthenes entreating a little respite as it had been to write somewhat, secretly took Poyson which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to do the last Execution upon himself, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man) argued some Valour in him, who was otherwise too much a Coward in Battel, howsoever valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loved Money well, and had great sums given him by the Persians, to encourage him in finding Work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (methinks) in taking from the Persians which loved not his Country, great rewards, for speaking such things as tended to his Countries Good; which he did not cease to procure, when the Persians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his Death can endure no honourable, though true mention of Antipater, may (if they can) believe Lucian, who tells us, That it was Antipater's purpose to have done him great Honour. Sure it is, that he was a steadfast Enemy to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chief Command was left in the hands of Phocion, a virtuous man, and lover of his Country, yet applying himself to the necessity of the Times; by which Commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this Peace, which (though grievous to Freedmen, yet favourable to the Vanquished) he endeavoured carefully to preserve.

§. VII.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawn from their Ætolian Wars into Asia. The Grounds of the first Civil War between the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their Friendship with a new Alliance, Craterus taking Philis, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Ætolians, whose Poverty was not so easily daunted, as the Luxurious Wealth of the more Powerful State of Athens had been. Their Country was rough and mountainous, having many Places of great fastness, into which they conveyed such of their Goods as they most esteemed, and of their People as were least fit for War, with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obtrusity did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the Places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their Victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut up all Passages, and utterly debarred them of Relief; then were they put to a miserable Choice; either to descend from their strong Holds and fight upon equal Ground with unequal Numbers, or to endure the Miseries of Hunger and Cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yield themselves to the Macedonians: who incited by the loss of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave so stubborn Enemies in Places which might give confidence to Rebellion. In cafes of extremity, much fineness of Wit apprehending all circumstances of danger commonly doth more hurt, than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Ætolians did not as yet want Meat; but their Enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought upon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their Courage. For such news came out of Asia into the Macedonian Camp, as made Antipater and Craterus think every hour a month, till they had rid their hands of these Ætolians, giving them whatsoever Conditions they would ask; yet with purpose to call them to severe account: yea, to root them out of Greece by death, or by Captivity, when once they should have settled the Affairs of Asia, as they hoped and desired. But of mens Purposes God is the Disposer: in whose holy Council it was ordained that this poor Nation should continue a troublesome bar to the Proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchy) an open Gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the Reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so far from taking effect, that it served merely as an Introduction to all the Civil Wars ensuing.

The Grounds of the Asiatick Expedition, which did set the World in an Up-roar, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexander's Captains the mightiest in Reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient Precedency, and the present Rule which he bare in the parts of Europe: The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next unto these had Perdiccas been, whom the advantage of his Prefecture at the Kings Death did make equal, or superior to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were to have conformed with these two, and to have been with them a third Partner in the Government of all: to which purpose he entertained the Discourse of Marriage with one of Antipater's Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that Gale of Wind which bore him up, he began to take Wing and soar quite another way. Antipater was a very simple man, yet served well enough to wear the Title of that Majesty, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietary, the practice was more severe than had been in the days of Alexander: the desire to seem terrible being very familiar with weak Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other means of preserving themselves from contempt, as may dazzle the eyes of the Beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Asia were all put to the Sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already been shewed. The Pisidians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfeited Alexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the Children sold for Slaves, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians by this example grown desperate, when after two or three days trual they found themselves unable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their Houses and set fire to the Town on fire, into the Flame whereof the young men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the Walls.

These Exploits being performed, the Army had no other Work than to sift the Ashes of the burnt City for Gold and Silver; but Perdiccas had business of greater importance troubling his brains. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to sit still without employment, letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilst others grew great, and took deep root in their several Provinces. He purposed therefore to transport his Forces into Europe, under pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the Seat of his Ancestors, and Head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the Offices of his Viceroy (during the time) actually void; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and only Perdiccas holding Authority, the March with Cleopatra might easily be made. So should greatness meet with a good Title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the Power of Ptolemy might give, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with Love of the People; yet if the business prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolemy would follow of himself, or be driven to come to reason. Antigonius likewise then governing in Phrygia, a busy headed man, and ill affected to the side, was to be looked into and made away, for fear of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in so thinking. Antigonius was as good a Man of War, of as deep a Judgment, as high a Spirit, and as great Undertaking as any of Alexander's Captains. His employments had been less than some of theirs, which made him also less respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs; for he valued himself by his own Worth, not by the Opinions of other men; with careful attention had he watched Perdiccas, and founded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discover. For Perdiccas having with a jealous eye eyed into the demeanour of Antigonius, and finding him no way fit for his turn, caused him to be charged with such Accusations as might suffice to take away his Life, especially by a Judge that sought his Death. This device Antigonius would not seem to perceive, but prepared himself in shew to make answer, indeed, to make escape, which easily he did, putting himself and his son Demetrius aboard of some Athenian Gallies that carried him to Antipater, laden with such Tidings as finished the Ætolian War before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonius made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceive their own danger: so his flight gave Perdiccas to understand that his Intentions were laid open, and must now be justified by the Sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could, not only for defence, but (as having on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at Home, who were nothing slack in providing to encounter him. Ptolemy being advertised of these proceedings, and considering how nearly they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his Government of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without content of the chief Citizens; and now in the midst of these Garboils he celebrated the Funeral of Alexander with great solemnity, purchasing thereby to himself much good will and many Partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Army coming against him.

§. VIII.

Perdiccas His Voyage into Egypt, and his Death.

Perdiccas, uncertain which way to bend his main Power, at length resolved to set upon Ptolemy; leaving Eumenes to keep to his use, against against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering upon Euphrate.

It may seem strange, that he did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Protlomy could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Protlomy; or believed that Craterus would not be ready for him soon enough. Sure it is that he took a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling.

Protlomy by his sweet Behaviour allured many to his Party, without help of any bad Arts. Pedricas contrariwise was full of Infolvency, which never failed to be rewarded with Hatred; that is truly defined. An Affection founded upon Opinion of an unjust Contempt. The whole Story of his proceedings in Aegypt is not worth relating: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilful man) tired his Followers, and wasted them in hard Enterprizes without success. His most forcible Attempt was upon a little Town called the Camels Wall: thither he marched by night, with more haste than good speed; for Protlomy preventing him, did put himself into the place, where behaving himself not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, he gave the Foil to Pedricas, causing him to retire with loss, after a vehement, but vain Assault continued one whole day. The night following, Pedricas made an other Journey (which was his last) and came to the divisions of Nilus, over against Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to pass over his Army into an Island where he meant to incamp. The Current was strong, the Water deep, and hardly fordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants above the Passage, to break the violence of the Stream, and his Horse-men beneath it; to take up such as were carried away by swiftnels of the Water. A great part of his Army being arrived on the further Bank, the Channel began to wax deep; so that whereas the former Companies had waded up to the Chin, they who should have followed could find no footing. Whether this came by rising of the Water, or flitting away of the Ground (the Earth being broken with the Feet of so many Men, Horse, and Elephants) no remedy there was, but such as had passed must re-pass again, as well as they might: for they were too weak for the Enemy, and could not be relieved by their Fellows. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the River wherein above two thousand of them perished, a thousand were devoured by Crocodiles; a miserable Spectacle even to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swim recovered the Camp, many were carried down the Stream, and driven to the contrary Bank, where the fell into the hands of their Enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their General, giving liberty to their Tongues, which long time had concealed the civil thoughts of their Hearts. While they were thus murmuring, news came from Protlomy, which did fire them in an Up-roar. Protlomy had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell in to his hands alive, but performed all Rights of Funeral to the dead Carcasses, which the River had cast upon his side; and finally, sent their Bones and Ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not only move the common Souldiers, but made the Captains fall to mummy, thinking it unreasonable to make War upon so virtuous and honourable a Person, to fulfil the Pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, using them like Slaves. The Sedition growing strong, wanted only a Head, which it quickly found. Pythos was there, who inwardly hated Pedricas, for the Disgrace which he had suffered by his procurement after the Victory upon the rebellious Greeks. Pythos had lived in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the division of the Provinces made Governor of Media; he had followed Pedricas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equal to him, had nevertheless been scornfully used by him, which now he required. Drawing together a hundred of the Captains, and a good part of the Horse, which consisted of the Gentry, (the Foot-men having declared themselves before) he entered the Tent of Pedricas, where, without further circumstance they all ran upon him, and flew him. Such end had the proud misgoverning Authority of Pedricas. He might have lived as great as any, could he have suffered any as great as himself; yea, peradventure Master of all, had he not been too masterly over those which were already his.

The next day Protlomy came into the Camp, where he was joyfully received; he executed himself of things past, as not having been Author, or given cause of the War, and was easily believed: the Favour of the Army being such toward him, that needs they would have made him Proprietor in the room of Pedricas. But this he refused. It was an Office fit for one, that would fick to increase his greatness with his trouble. Protlomy was well enough already; wherefore, for his own quiet he forbore to accept it, and for their well-deserving of him, he procured that honourable Charge to Pythos, and to Aridaeus the Captain, who having had some Companies of Souldiers to furnish with their attendance the Solemnities of Alexander's Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Pedricas.

In the midst of these busineses came news of two great Victories obtained by Eumenes; which news, had they arrived two or three days sooner, had been entertained with joyful acclamations; and would have given such reputation to Pedricas, as had caused both his private Maligners to continue his open Flatterers, and his open Enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings coming in ill time, when death had stopped the ears which would have given them welcome, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Asia.

Before we proceed in the relation of things, it is meet that we speak of those busineses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whilst Pedricas was occupied in the Aegyptian Wars. Alcetas, the Brother of Pedricas, and Neoptolemus, had received command from Pedricas to be assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made far answer, that he would not; alleging the backwardness of his men to bear Arms against so great a Person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make fair shew, but inwardly he repined at the Precedency given to Eumenes, as thinking himself the better man. Eumenes, discovering through the counterfeited looks of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to win him by gentle behaviour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bellowed upon arrogant Creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himself, that he might stand upon his own strength, he raised out of the Countries under his Jurisdiction, about six thousand Horse, giving many privileges to such as were serviceable, and training them well up. Not without great need: For when upon advertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellepont) for the invasion of his Provinces, he would Neoptolemus did (indeed) advance, but in hostile manner, though unprovoked, presented him Battle. Neoptolemus had secretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the Conquest of Asia, which now intending to perform, he was shamefully disappointed. For though his Foot-men, being all Macedonian, had much the better, and prevailed far upon Eumenes his Bat-tles: yet were his Horse driven out of the Field, and himself compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian Foot-men, to be charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that casting down their Pikes, they cried for mercy, and gladly took their Oath to do him faithful service. Antipater and Craterus endeavoured with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their Society, who contrariwise offered himself, as a mean of reconciliation, between Pedricas and Craterus, whom he dearly loved; professing withal his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had undertaken to maintain.

Whilst these Negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crew to Antipater and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laughed) but extolling the virtue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appear, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Camp, the Victory was won, for they would all forthwith revolt unto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to give him aid against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might have the leading of the Army to be sent. Their own affections did easily lead them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevail as much, as the force which he drew along. For he had in the midst of Alexander's vanities, when others (imitating their King) betook themselves to the Persian fashions of Garments, and Customs, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour and apparel; whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia with discontented Eyes, as reproachful and derogatory to the manners of their Native Country.

So Antipater took the way toward Cilicia, to hold Pedricas at bay, and to join with Protlomy. Craterus used great celerity, to have taken Eumenes retreating (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captains after a great Victory. But he had a wary and well-advised Enemy to encounter, who kept good espial upon him, and with much wisdom fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the means of prevention, which his courage did not fail to execute.

Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without Battle, yea, without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him was such as much exceeded his own in Foot-men, but was inferior in Horse-men) and thought it more unseemly to keep the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange piece of work, which desperation (of all courtes else) taught him, and wife managing, prosperously accomplished. He gave our reports that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captain of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to join with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be defided and hated among them, (as having been vanquished by some of them, and forsaken others in plain Field, whilst they valiantly fought in his Quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the Enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no Messenger nor Trumpeter should be admitted; and not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that would have regarded him had he been known: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Perfians, under the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Pedricas and himself. To these also he gave in charge, that without speaking or hearkening to any word, they should run upon the Enemy, and give him no leisure to say or do any thing, but fight. The directions which he gave to others, he did not fail to execute in his own person: but placing himself in the right wing of his Battle, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he understood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge the Enemy as soon as the distance would give leave. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which having ascended, the Armies discovered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long Journeys, which over-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitful view of frivolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (having failed in surprising them as Enemies) to discover himself to his old Friends and fellow-souldiers, of whom he could fee none. Phenias, a Tenidian, and Arabacatus, a Perfian, had the leading of that side, who mindful of their instructions, began to give upon him with such countenance, as told him his error; which to redeem, he bad his men fight and win the day, and take the spoil to themselves. But the Bear whose skin he sells, is not yet caught. The ground whereon the Battle was fought gave most advantage to the Horse, who encountered very roughly on all parts; especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus, who as soon as they had discovered one another, could not contain themselves, but with great rage met body to body, and letting loose their Bridges, grappled so violently together, that their Horses ran from under them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first up, but Eumenes had his Sword first drawn, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall down and fight upon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giving slight ones, took such as were deadly, by which he died in the place, and was there (being half-dead, half-alive) stripped by his mortal Enemy, whose revilings he required, lying even at the last gasp, with one wound in the groin, dangerous, had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to run away upon the foot, and seek shelter behind the battels of their Force. They were nothing hotly pursued: For Eumenes pained himself to carry succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed, but found accompanied with the same Fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in Person. Craterus had gallantly bound himself himself a while, and sustained the impression of Antipater and Phenice, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his Honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or more. Otherwise it is not unlikely, that he might have either carried the day, or preserved himself to a better adventure by giving ground, as the rest (when he and Nectolemus were slain) did. But whilst he sought to preserve his Reputation, he lost his life by the fall of his Horse, or his falling from his Horse, through force of a wound received; upon which accident he was trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and so perished unknown, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes coming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as having always loved and honoured Craterus, of whose death he was now become the instrument. The vanquished Army entertained a Treaty of Peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingness to become his followers; but their intent was only to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) having done, they stole away by Night, and fled toward Antipater.

This Battle fought within ten days of the former war to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his own Soldiers took the death of Craterus heavily; and the Armies lying further off were enraged with the news. But other matters there were which incensed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that he was as sorry as any that pretended greater heaviness. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended, by giving to them the spoil of such Towns as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the love of his own men, who of their meer motion appointed unto him a guard for defence of his Person. Others were not so easy to be reconciled. They who had been Traitors to Perdiccas hated him for his faithfulness, as greedily, as they thought that he would hate them for their falshood; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late revolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to die; but it was an easier matter to give that sentence, than to put it in execution.

§. X.

Quarrels between Eurydice the Queen, and Python the Protector. Python resigns his Office, into which Antipater is chosen.

Python and Arideus being chosen Protectors of King Arideus, and the Children of Alexander, took the way to Asia the Less, conducting the Army through Syria. Of these two Python was the greater in reputation, yet far too weak to sustain so important a charge. For Eurydice, Wife to King Arideus, was come to her Husband, a Lady of a Masculine spirit, well understanding what she was or should be, and thinking her self able to support the weight which Fortune had laid upon her foolish Husband, being due to her own Title. Her Mother Cyna, Sister to Alexander by her Father Philip, was Married (as hath been shewed) to Antipater, who was right Heir to the Kingdom of Macedon, being the only Son of King Perdiccas, Philip's elder Brother.

This Cyna was a Warlike Woman; she had led Armies, and (as a true Sister of Alexander's) fighting hand to hand with Ceria Queen of the Phry- gians, a Virago like unto her self, had slain her. She brought up this Eurydice in the same unwomanly Art of War, who now among the Soldiers began to put in practice the rudiments of her Education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brook her curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so that Python had some purpose to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdom; (as once he had sought to do) or whether the Queen did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only desire of Rule caused her to quarrel with him, quarrel she did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Army having shaken off such a rank-ranker as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined thread. Python bearing himself upon his Office, took upon him to give directions in the King's Name, which the Queen did oftentimes controul, using the same name, with more Authority, and better liking of the Soldiers. Python, facing this, would needs resign his Office, whether upon weariness of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queen into envy, it is uncertain. Perhaps he thought, that now being the far worsted man in the Camp, he should be intreated to retain the place, and have his Authority confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurydice was nothing sorry at this course; for now she thought to manage the affairs of the Empire at her own will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Soldiers disappointed both her and Python of their contrary expectations; choosing Antipater, the only powerful man of Alexander's Captains then living, into the room of Python. Hereat the Queen fretted exceedingly, and began to deal earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord save only the King their Sovereign. Yet she failed of her purpose, being hindered (as may seem) by three things: the apparent weakness of her Husband, the growth of Alexander's Children, who (though born of outlandish Women) were bred in the Macedonian Camp; and the mightiness of Antipater, who commanding a great Army near at hand arrived in few days at the Camp, and enforced Eurydice to hold her self content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to work by any close devices, as Perdiccas had done; he had no concurrents, all the Governors of Provinces that remained alive acknowledged him their better; yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their rooms. This done, he took the King, Queen, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antipater General of the Royal Army: to whom for his good services done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gave the rule of Syria, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the Government of Asia during that War.

§. XI.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, wins a Battle of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora: He vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

Here begins the greatness of Antigonus, whose power in few years overgrowing the rest, wanted little of spreading it self over the whole Monarchy. He was to make War upon Eumenes, Alexus the Brother, and Aristus the Brother-in-law to Perdiccas: work enough to keep his Army employed in the Publick Service, till such time as he might find occasion to make use of it in his own business.

business. The first of these which he undertook was Eumenes, with whom Alectus and Attalus refused to joyn, having unfavourably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needful provisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all ways of corrupting his Soldiers, tempting first the whole Army with Letters; which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himself had scattered abroad those Letters to try the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captains, as he thought most easy to be won. Of these Captains one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any help was near him, yet looking so carelessly to himself, that he and his were surpris'd, when he thought his Enemies far off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good Fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his Treachery secret, reserving it for the time of execution. Upon confidence of the Treason which this false man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonus presented Battle to Eumenes; in the heat whereof, Apollonides, General of the Horse to Eumenes, fled over to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes, perceiving the irrecoverable mischief which this traitorous practice brought upon him, pursued the Villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himself into the Troups of Antigonus, and boast of his Treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the loss of that Battle, which disabled him utterly to keep the Field, and left it very hard for him to make safe retreat. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his Enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himself to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the Victory to get possession of the dead Bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compass returned to the place where the Battle had been fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captains and common Soldiers apart, raising up heaps of Earth as Mountains over them, and to went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians (returned to their Camp) great admiration of his brave spirit; so the news which Menander (who was set to look unto their Carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable Friend. He had found Menander in an open Plain, careless, as after an assured Victory, and laden with the spoils of many Nations, the rewards of their long Service, all which he might have taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should prove a heavy burthen to him, whose chief hope consisted in swift expedition, he gave secret warning to Menander to flee to the Mountains, whilst he detained his men (whom Authority could not have restrained) by this slight, letting them to bait their Horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtship, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborn when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their Wealth, and make their Children Slaves, and to ravish their Wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborn to do this out of any good will to them; but out of meer subtilty had avoided those precious Fetters, which would have hindered his speedy flight. He told them true: For Eumenes did not only think all Carriages to be over-burdensome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than available, in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselves; and retaining only five hundred Horse, and two hundred Foot. When he had wearied Antigonus a while in following him up and down, he came to Nora; where again, keeping no more about him, than necessity required to make good the place, he lovingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fort in the borders of Lycania and Cappadocia, so strongly situated, that it seemed impregnable; and so well situated and stored with all Necessaries, that it might hold out for many years. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more desire to make him his Friend, than to vanquish him in War. To this purpose he entertained parley with him, but in vain. For whereas Antigonus offered him Pardon, and his love; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipater's consent. Then was Nora closed up; where Antigonus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the Siege, took his Journey into Pisidia against Alectus and Attalus, with whom he made short work. He came upon them unexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captain as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alectus and Attalus, as they had been too secure before his coming, lo were they too adventurous in fighting at the first fight, upon all disadvantages; and their folly was attended with futable event: Attalus with many principal Captains was taken; Alectus fled to the City of Termessus, where the love of the younger sort was toward him so vehement, that stopping their Ears against all persuasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazard their lives and their Country in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing: For the Governors of the Town, having secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the young men to fall out; and using the time of advantage, they with their Servants did set upon Alectus, who unable to resist, slew himself. His dead Body was conveyed to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torn, was cast forth without Burial. When Antigonus was gone, the young men interred the Carcass with solemn Funerals, having once been minded to set on fire their own Town, in revenge of his death. Such favour had he purchased with courteous liberality: but to make an able General, one verue, how great soever, is insufficient.

§. XII.

Protony wins Syria and Phoenicia. The death of Antipater.

Whilst these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enjoy their Governments for the present, than to confirm or enlarge them. Only Protony looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phoenicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant thither with an Army, who quickly took Laomedon Prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seem) without any great strength of Soldiers, far from assistants, and vainly relying upon the Authority which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintain him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonos pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polyperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexander's Captains, that had lately suppressed a dangerous Insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had flired in the Quarrel of Perdiccas, prevailing far at the first, but soon losing all that they had gained, whilst Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polyperchon Antipater did repose great confidence; so far forth, that (suspecting the Youth of his own Son Cassander of insufficiency in so great a charge) he bequeathed unto him on his Death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being fourscore years old, having always travelled in the great Affairs of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatness was jealous of him, and the Successors of Alexander did either quietly give place unto him, or were unfortunate in making oppositions. In his private qualities he was a fickle man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philosophical behaviour; not unlearned, as having been Scholar to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had been much molested by Olympias, Alexander's Mother, whom after the death of her Son she compelled to abstain from coming into Macedonia, or intermeddling in matters of Estate: yea, at his own death he gave especial direction, that no Woman should be permitted to deal in the administration of the Empire. But this Precept was soon forgotten; and yet, ere long, by sorrowful experience approved to have been found and good.

§. XIII.

Of Polyperchon who succeeded unto Antipater in the Protectorship. The Insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polyperchon was very skilful in the Art of War, having long time been Apprentice in that Occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as he underwent, either Nature had not given him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his business more formally, than wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than to Command in Chief. At the first entrance upon the Stage he called to Council all his Friends, wherein, for weighty considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queen Olympias was revoked out of Epirus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexander's Mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Provinces abroad should keep greater Armies, than were needful or easy to be retained about the Person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all Majesty, that might give Authority to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awful regard contain within the bounds of Duty such as could not by force have been kept in order, being strong, and lying too far off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginary dangers and our of fight, whilst present mischief lay unregarded in their bosoms. Cassander, the Son of Antipater, was not able to discover that great sufficiency in Polyperchon, for which his Father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could he discern such odds in the Quality of himself and Polyperchon, as was in their Fortune.

He was left Captain of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the Title now seems to imply. He should thereby have been as Camp-Master, or Lieutenant General to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himself the better man. Therefore he began to examine his own power, and compare with the Forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his Father were his own assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principal Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principal Authority, in those Common-wealths, whose forms had been corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their own particular to adhere unto the Captains by whom their Faction was upheld; and by whom the rascal multitude, covetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised over the principal Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters performance. Besides all these helps, Cassander had the secret love of Queen Eurydice, who had in private rendered him such courtship, as was due only to her Husband. But neither the Queens favour, nor all his other possibilities, gave him confidence to break out into open Rebellion, because he saw Polyperchon much revered among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him before he could have made head. Therefore he made show of following his pleasures in the Country, and calling many of his Friends about him, under pretence of Hunting, advised with them upon the safest course, and most free from all suspicion. The necessity was apparent of raising an Army, before the business were set on foot; and to do this, Opportunity presented him with fair means. Ptolemy had by fine force, without any Commission, annexed Syria to his Government of Ægypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonos upon the first news of Antipater's death, began to lay hold upon all that he could get, in such sort that he manifestly discovered his intent of making himself Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in need of a Civil War; which Cassander well noted, and presumed wisely. That the friendship which had passed between his Father and them, would avail him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched Messengers to them both; and within a little while conveyed himself on a sudden over the Hellepont, that he might in person advance the business with greater speed. Much persuasion is needless in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonos coveted nothing more, than to find Polyperchon weak by raising some Commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly press him, by the memory of his Father, and all requisite conjurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him that Ptolemy was ready to declare for them, and urging him to a speedy dispatch. Antigonos on the other side repayed him with the same coin; saying, That for his own sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearly loved, he would not fail to give him all manner of succour. Having thus feasted one another with words, they were nothing slack in preparing the common means leading to their several ends.

§. XIV.

§. XIV.

The unworthy counsels held by Polyperchon, for the keeping down of Cassander.

Great necessity there was of timely provision. For Polyperchon needed no other Instructions to inform him of Cassander's drift, than the news of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonos and Ptolemy, to the strengthening of Rebellion; and well he knew that one principal hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Estate. Therefore (loving to work circumspectly) he called another Council, wherein it was concluded, That the popular form of Government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates and principal Men, into whose hands Cassander had committed the supreme Authority, should forthwith be either slain or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassander's Friends, and to raise up many Enemies to him in all Quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an unthankful nature in Polyperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Son went about to dishonour the Father's actions, whose only bounty had enabled him to do it? or what could be said in their defence, who fought to destroy many worthy men, Friends to the State, by whom the Greeks were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians; and in opposition to their private Enemy, gave the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans Body, through sinews newly illing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrary hand: so in Bodies politic, the humours of men, subdivided in faction, are more enraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curb them in their nearest purposes, than they are exasperated by the general opposition of such as are divided from them in the main trunk. Herby it comes to pass, that contrary Religions are invited to help against neighbour Princes; bordering Enemies drawn in, to take part in Civil Wars; and ancient hatred called to counsel against injurious Friends. Of this fault Nature is not guilty; she hath taught the Art to offer it self unto manifest loss in defence of the Head: they are depraved affections, which render men sensible of their own particular, and forgetful of the more general good, for which they were created.

The Decree, whereby the Greeks were presented with a vain show of liberty, ran under the King's Name; but so, as one might easily discern, that Polyperchon had guided his Pen. For the main point was, That they should follow such Directions as Polyperchon gave, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deal of kindness, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appear to have some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it self too base and unfit for a King to use toward his conquered Subjects, and often-subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great Commotions raised in Athens by Polyperchon's Decree. The Death of Phocion.

Nevertheless the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captain of the Garrison, which kept one of their Havens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hasty desires.

Nicanor, as a trusty follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the Place, and Menicles (that was slain there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way grateful to the Citizens, who soon after hearing the news of Antipater's Death, cried out upon Phocion, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that Accident, and might by advertising them in due time have put into their hands a fair opportunity of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these Exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Far more grievously would they have been offended, had they known the Instructions which Cassander had given to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not only retain Munychia, any injunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that he should find means to thrust some Companies into Piræus, and fortify that also, which was the principal Haven, against the high Town. How to accomplish this he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good ability. But the Athenians were not long in giving him sufficient cause to do that, which he would have done without any cause given. The day desired him to come unto their Council, assembled in the Piræus, there to consider of the King's Proclamation; whither upon Phocion's word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the War which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise they urged him first of all, to make them Masters of their own, which how to use they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend unto the others demand; the Athenians (who did always measure justice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Dercyllus, a Captain following Polyperchon, and then lying near at hand, that he should enter into the Town, and take Nicanor Prisoner. But Phocion who then governed in Athens, a man very unlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politic dishonesty, did quietly suffer him to depart and save himself.

Nicanor hereupon began to devise upon taking Piræus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his own just revenge. He levied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus, took it, and entrenched himself therein: to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, saw him now Master of both. Alexander the Son of Polyperchon, came thither shortly after, with an Army. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recovering all, and addressed themselves unto him; who made fair shews, intending meer mischief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vain Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queen. Olympias taking upon her to command, before she durst well adventure to return into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor honourable than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore break off the Negotiation, and wait for some better occasion of enlargement, which might perhaps be long in coming; but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to give up his Hold and depart. As for the Oath it self, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemn enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying their Allegiance. The Macedonians which lay encamped before Nova, liked his Words, and gave him leave to put in Olympias, and the Children of Alexander, binding himself to them and their Adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken upon him, as soon as he came down to the Sea-side, to remove some of the Governours of Provinces, behaving himself according to the Authority which he had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of War. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to justify his Proceedings. For if Polyperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doing on his Death-bed bequeathed unto him as a Legacy, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not he himself as well retain the Luxurianship of Asia, that was granted unto him for the general good of the State, in presence of the whole Army, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordain what should seem convenient whilst he lived, not to dispose of things that should happen after his Death? To give a fair colour to his Ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had three-score thousand Foot-men, ten thousand Horse, and thirty Elephants in a readiness to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Aridæus Governour of Phrygia; who fortified the Towns of his own Province, and fought to have won Cyzicus, a fair Haven Town, and seated very conveniently for him, but was fain to go away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occasion to command him out of the Country. Aridæus was so far from obeying him, that he sent Forces to relieve Eumenes. Nevertheless finding that he was unable of himself to make long resistance, he took such Companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed over into Europe, to complain at the Court. The like Fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and fought the like remedy of his Fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good Words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

§. XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes, Eumenes having Authority from the Court, raises great War against Antigonus, in defence of the Royal House.

Antigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of Asia the less, was able to have entered Macedon, and seized upon the Court; which that he forbore to do, it proceeded (as may seem) for some of these reasons. It would have bred as much jealousy in Cassander, as fear in Polyperchon, which might have brought them to terms of reconciliation; It would ask more time than he could spare; and the Envy which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make War upon him in defence of the Royal House, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore he bent his Course, and with an Army of twenty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppress him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithful to their dead Master, which being well known in the Court, he had Commission sent unto him from thence to raise an Army, and make War upon Antigonus, taking of the Kings Treasure as much as he should need. Other Letters also there were directed to all the Governours of Provinces, requiring them to give assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captains of the old Souldiers, called the Argyropides, or Silver-shielded Bands, Commandment was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old Followers gathered together two thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, before this Authority was given him; but now he purposed with all the strength that he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royal Blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring help to her and her Nephew the Son of Alexander, and in the mean time, to give her his advice in that which Polyperchon required of her, for she was desirous to return into Macedon, but suspected his Ambition, as not contained within lawful bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remain in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the War to a good issue; which done, he promised that his Faith and Care should not be wanting to the Seed of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarce any one could be found among the Noble Men, in whom Alexanders Mother, Wives and Children, might repose firm Confidence, saving only this Eumenes, a Stranger to the Macedonian Blood, born at Cardia, a City of Thrace. His Reputation was no more than his own Verace had made it; his Followers obeyed at their own discretion; and compelled he was to travel as far as Perfia, to gather together an Army sufficient to resist the Enemies that pursued his Heels.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Aridæus and Euridice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

NOW, forasmuch as in this present War all the Rulers of the Provinces did entermeddle; and great alterations happened, not only in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it self, which brought a new Face unto the State, by the extirpation of the Royal House of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the War it self, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawn into those courses which overthrew most of them, and out of their Ruines built the greatness of a few: as likewise to what extremity the Faction brake out in Macedon it self, about the main controvercie of Title to the Crown, whereupon all other Quarrels were or should have been depending.

Aridæus the King, being simple and fearful, did only what he was bidden.

Polyperchon

Polyperchon desirous to continue long in Office, for a purpose to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdom, and become Governour to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queen discovering plainly his intent, and meaning nothing less than to order her Husband serve as a Slave, keeping the Thracians warm, till another were grown old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the Memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turn.

Cassander held fresh in mind the danger which his Family had been through Alexanders Malice, together with the indignity offered to himself by Alexander, who knocked his Head against a Wall, for desiring one that adored him after the Perfian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he took in the amorous Queen, made him resolve, both to suppress the Lineage which he hated, and to maintain his beloved Mistress, either by supporting her weak Husband, or by taking her to be his own Wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned over all, so as they might reign in their several Countries, and establish their authority in such wife, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Phlomy and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Pytho and Seleneus lying far off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach upon their Neighbours. Against these, Peneceus and some others with much ado hardly made resistance, until such time as Eumenes came to them, who propounded to himself great matters which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queen (as it is common with Srep-dames) hated the Children of her Husband by their own Wives. It was thought that she had given Poyson to Aridæus, which failing to take away his Life, had much impaired both his Body and Wits. Now the considering that Eumenes was too full of business to come home so soon as she wished that he should, and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece; thought it the best way to join with Polyperchon, and set up, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the Son of Roxane, removing Aridæus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her Kindred in Epirus, and so took her way towards Polyperchon, who joining with her, entered into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these news, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other business, and come to succour her. She her self, by Entreaty, Gifts and Promises, drew to her Party as many of the Macedonians as she could, until the thought her own side strong enough; and then taking her Husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polyperchon.

These two Queens met armed, as if the matter should have been determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke Stricken, by the Revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soon as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious Reigns of her Husband and Son, they refused to lift any Weapon against her. Eurydice finding herself thus forsaken, fled towards Zimphopolis, but was intercepted and made Prisoner with her Husband.

Olympias having obtained this Victory without Blood, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and that upon the same considerations for which they had refused to bear Arms against her, the Macedonians would not stick to maintain her, whatsoever her proceedings were. Having therefore shut up Aridæus and his Wife in a close Room, where they could scarce turn round, she fed them through a little Hole, till after a while it came in her head (for fear left the People should have commiseration of him that had reigned almost six years and a half) to put them to death. So she delivered Aridæus to some barbarous Thracians, who took away his Life by cruel Torments: to Eurydice, she sent a Sword, a Halter, and a Cup of Poyson, willing her to choose the Instrument of her own Death, who praying that the like Pretensions might one day be sent to Olympias, yielded her Neck to the Halter, having spent her last Curles not in vain: Alexander the Brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chief of his Friends, did Olympias then choose out, all whom she commanded to be slain. His Brother Idæus that was already dead, but buried, the accused of Poysoning to Alexander; and thereupon caused his Tomb to be thrown down, and his Bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians, wondering at this Fury, began to condemn themselves, and the Folly of Polyperchon, who had, quite contrary to Antipaters charge given on his Death-bed, called this outrageous Woman to the Government of the Empire.

§. XX.

How Cassander was revenged upon Olympias.

† I.

The great Expedition of Cassander: Olympias sends her self into Pydna, where Cassander besieges her: Aëtiades, King of Epirus, coming to succour Olympias, is forsaken, and banished by his own Subjects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnese; whether when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he never staid to take the City, nor to give order for the state of things in that Country, (though Alexander the Son of Polyperchon were there with an Army) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his Associates to look to themselves as well as they could, till his return, and so in all haste he took his Journey toward Macedon, carried head-long with the greedy desire of just revenge. The Ætolians had taken the Straights of Thermopylae, in favour of the Queen and Polyperchon, to hinder his passage; but he not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many Ships as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he divided his Companies, appointing some under Callar, a subtil Captain, to hold Polyperchon busied, who then lay encamped near to Perbehis; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, having once prevailed by the respect given to her Dignity, took more care now to appear Majestical, than to make her self strong. To this end she made a solemn Progress to Pydna, a Sea-Town, and well fenced, having in her company all the flower of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her young Son Alexander. Heir to the great Alexander, by his Grand-mothers designation; who, during his Minority, kept the Sovereign Power in her own hands. But all this Pomp served to little use, against the violence of the Enemy, that soon presented himself before the Walls: only it fed the besieged with a vain hope of succour, that would

from

from all parts arrive, to rescue Persons of their Quality. And hereof there soon appeared fair likelihood, which as soon vanished, and went away in smoke.

For Lucius, King of Epirus, made great haste to bring succour to Olympias his Cousin, with whom Dreadamia his Daughter was also fast up. Nevertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certain passages taken in the way by Cassander's men, they called upon him to retire, and quit the enterprise. The Kings importunity urging them to proceed, and the obstinate refusal of the Army, brake out at length into such terms, that when he had raged in vain against the multitude, his Authority, with which he thought to have prevailed upon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdom, and to wander up and down in Foreign Countries, a banished man; his People joining with the Enemy, against whom he had led them forth to War.

Pydna in the mean time was closed up straightly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the City, nor any relief be conveyed into it; but it held out as long as any Food was left, no memorable Service being done there, whilst great Actions were managed abroad.

§. II.

A continuation of Olympias her story. Polyperchon defeated. Extream Famine in Pydna. Olympias yields to Cassander.

NOW, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of Eumenes and Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a while to the hour of her Destiny, which grows the faster upon her, because she may discern it coming; yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our Narration, by inserting her Tragedy in the midst of things, not manifestly coherent with it, we will here (as elsewhere we have done, and elsewhere must) continue to end one History, that we may not be therewith distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polyperchon, was in like manner disappointed, as their former trust had been, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirus. For Calas, who was sent against him, found the means to corrupt the greatest part of his Army with Money, leaving him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other business of War, than a swift retreat. When Harmis had so far prevailed in the City, that the Horses were killed as a precious Food, many men feeding on the dead carcasses of their fellows, and Sawdust being given to the Elephants for Provender; some of the Souldiers obtaining the Queens leave; (who could not deny it) others, without asking leave, yielded themselves to the Enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and sent abroad into the Country. The news of the Queens affairs, dispersed by these men, did so affright her well-willers, that such as had reserved themselves to the event, came in apace, and furnished them to Cassander. At length, when the Mortality was so great in the Town, that the living were even poisoned with the noisome scent of the dead; Olympias bethought her self of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had; where, in her success was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Town, by her chosen as a place of Refuge, to be unto her as a House of Torment, and a Gaol, out of which she should not be delivered, but unto an evil death. Being therefore utterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, unaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition; and with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander (who having fetch'd her Galley out of the Haven, accounted himself as good as Master of her Body) a grant of her own life. Immediately upon her apprehension, Pella, the chief City of the Kingdom, was yielded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Arifonius, to whom Olympias had given charge of such Forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the success of some petty services wherein he had prevailed, began to promise himself great unhappiness. But Olympias, to win Cassander's favour, very earnestly required him upon his faith to her, that he should give it up. He did so; and presently after was killed by his private Enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him upon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seek innovation.

§. III.

The death of Olympias, and her Condition.

WHEN Olympias had now heard sorrowful tidings of all her Friends, she her self was called into question, and accused in an Assembly of the Macedonians, for the Murders (they were styled in her Affliction, which in time of Prosperity she called Justice) by her committed. There was she (being not heard, nor called to speak) condemned to die. The Suit was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slain. But it was at Cassander's instigation; who (to hasten the Execution) sent her word that he would furnish her with a Ship and other Necessaries, to save her self by flight: which when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her self, and tell her own tale; he dissembled no longer, but sent unto her such men as hated her most, who took away her miserable life. She was Daughter and Sister unto two Kings of Epirus, Wife and Mother unto two the mightiest Kings of that or many other Ages, a stout Lady, and of unrepentable Chastity; but her Ambition was boundless, her Hatred unappeasable, and her Fury in revenge most unwomanly. Her perverse Conditions made her Husband seek other Wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him and them. She was thought privy to her Husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late Wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two Children in her arms, and with a beastly fury broiled the other alive in fire, in a copper Balon. For these things, her son Alexander (otherwise loving her well) forbade her to meddle in the Government of Macedon. But God, more severe unto cruel Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wills, permitted her to live and fulfill the rest of her wickedness; (which was his Justice upon the Adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others) after all which he rewarded her malice, by returning it upon her own Head.

§. I.

Cassander celebrates the Funeral of Arifonius and Eurydice; and seeks to make himself King of Macedonia.

AFTER her death, Cassander gave honourable Burial to Arifonius and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking far into his own possibilities of greatness, he married the Lady Theffalonia, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the Daughter of King Philip by one of his Wives; that by her he might have some Title to the Crown. For the same end he committed Roxane and her young Son, to close Prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And the better to increase his Fame, and purchase Love, he built a City, called by his own name Cassandria, that soon grew to be very great and powerful. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it unto the old Inhabitants, after it had lain twenty years waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these means, especially by the restoration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew to strong, that few remained Enemies unto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will return to them, who contended in Asia for less Titles, but larger Provinces, with greater Forces.

CHAP. IV.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONUS got in Asia.

§. I.

The Journey of Eumenes into Persia. His wife dealing with those that joyned with him.

EUMENES, having joyned unto his company the Argraephides, made haste into the Eastern parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his Commission, and strengthen himself against Antigonus. He took his Journey through Cappadocia and Phenicia, hoping to reclaim those Provinces, usurped with the rest of Syria (as hath been shewed) by Ptolomy, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his halfe of passing forward was too great, his Army too little, and the readiness of the People to return to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the less effectual. The Captains of the Argraephides were so froward, that they scorned to repair to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so unsteady, that he might have more easily dealt with open Traytors. It was not expedient, that he, being General, should weaken his Authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keep them in order by compulsion. Therefore he feigned, that Alexander had appointed unto him in a Dream, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich Pavilion, wherein an empty Throne was placed, as if Alexander himself had been present at their consultations. Thus he freed himself from their vain Pride; but of their Faith he could have no assurance. Yet when Ptolomy requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So he marched on, sending before him the Kings Warrant, which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the Kings Authority, but excepting against the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Army, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to rely upon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected than his affairs required, and were not to be dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand through the Country of Babylon, in such wise, that Seleucus, having in vain assailed to hinder him, by opening the Sluces of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Peucester and the rest of the Eastern Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences between Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority, grew very hot among them; every one finding matter enough to feed his own humour of self-worthiness. But the former device of assembling in one Pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion ever being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giving Advice, and best able to Reward, by means of the Authority given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings Treasures. By these means he won to himself many of those who had most power to do good or hurt.

§. II.

How Antigonus, coming to set upon Eumenes, was driven off with loss.

Antigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings Treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soon as he had made himself strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the Enemies, with intent to give them Battle. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, and was retired back toward Persepolis, keeping the River of Tigris between him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, and good: Antigonus kept upon Antigonus, to observe which way he took. Before he came to Tigris it self, he was to pass over Copates, a great River, and not fordable, which he sought to do by small Vessels, whereof he had no great Force. A great part of his Army had gotten over, when Eumenes, who kept a Bridge upon Tigris, came with a thousand Horse, and four thousand Foot, to see their demeanour : and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drove them headlong back into Copates, wherein most of them were drowned ; very few escaping with life, except four thousand that yielded themselves Prisoners, in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieve them. This loss made Antigonus glad to fall off ; and the heat of that Country in the Dog-days, breeding Diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remove as far as into Media. So he took Pythion with him ; (leaving Seleucus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to go the nearest way, passed through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, with his Troops that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A Battle between him and Antigonus.

After his departure, Eumenes with his Associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their business. Fain he would have had them to enter upon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behind him ; to which also the Captains of the Argyrasides or Silver-shields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw nearer to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose Dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their own particular Estates, and would needs march Eastward. These carried it ; for the Army was not strong enough to divide it self into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all means to win the Soldiers love to himself. Eumenes, perceiving whereunto those doings tended, suffered him a while to keep good cheer, till the time of War drew near. Then did he feign an Epistle, directed, as from Orestes Governor of Armenia, to Peucestes himself : The purport whereof was ; that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent over a great Army under Polyperchon, to join with Eumenes. These news, as they filled the Camp with vain joy, so they wrought in all mens minds a great willingness to obey Eumenes ; by whom was the likeliest appearance of their preferment ; wherein they dealt wisely, he being far the most sufficient Commander, as they found soon after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew near unto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sick, and fain to be carried in a Litter ; the Army marched in very bad array, and was likely to have been forced to take Battle in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captains were amazed, was carried about the Army in his Litter, and upon the sudden did cast his men into good form, that Antigonus, perceiving him afar off, could not refrain from giving him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captains, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes ; which hopes deceiving him, he came to the trial of a Battle. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus ; otherwise, he was inferior in number both of Horse and Foot by a third part. The Battle was fought with variable success, and great loss on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the Victory was uncertain. For Eumenes could not force his men, to fly far from their Carriages ; by which means Antigonus (who had a more absolute command over his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies ; which was accounted the sign of Victory ; for by he buried his own, and gave leave to his Enemies, craving it, to do the like. But a greater sign of Victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not only buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Country round about ; whereas Antigonus was glad (having carried but one day) to steal away by night, and return into Media, from whence he came.

§. IV.

Of divers Stratagems practised by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

Thus did the War continue doubtful, and was protracted to a greater length, each part having stout Soldiers, and skillful Generals : but the side which had hitherto prevailed, being hindered by the equal Authority of many, from pursuing all advantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker in men and reputation, so that to repair himself, he could find no way fairer, than to put all to adventure. He knew that his Enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered far asunder, so that if, he could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distress. Between him and them the way was not long, being only nine days journey, but very bad, through a rough dry wilderness, hardly passable. Another way fairer, and leading through a Country well peopled, but requiring twenty five days journey, he forsook, partly for the length, partly and chiefly, because he would come undiscovered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbad unto his men the use of fire by night, because he would not have them defrised afar off. This commandment had been well observed four or five days, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being near to their ways end. The light of these fires gave notice of their coming ; which being reported to Peucestes, and other Captains, they were so astonished with the sudden danger, that in all haste they becook themselves to fight. But Eumenes, meeting with the news, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their men together. They could scarce believe him ; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He took with him some Companies of the readiest men, where-with he occupied certain tops of Mountains, looking toward the Camp of Antigonus : there he chose a convenient ground to incamp upon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Army had been present. This was a sorrowful spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himself prevented of his purpose ; and began to fear lest he should be compelled to fight, whilst his men were tired with a long and painful journey. Therefore he began to turn aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serve to refresh his Army. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be upon all advantages. But after a while, considering that no Enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and think in himself, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some Inhabitants of that Desert to be taken, and brought before him ; of whom he learned, that they had seen no other Army than his thereabout, but only a few men that kept fires on the Hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to find that he had been so deluded. Therefore he went against these Troops with great fury, meaning to take sharp vengeance on them, for having so deceived him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much business, and long time. All the Army was come, save only Eudamus, Captain of the Elephants, who, besides those Beasts, had no more than four hundred Horse-men in his Company. Antigonus hearing of this supply coming to his Enemies, sent above two thousand Horse, and all his light-armed Foot-men, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was fain to place his Elephants round about his Carriages, and so to defend himself as well as he could ; for his Horse-men being overlaid with multitudes were quickly broken, and driven to run away upon the spur. Neither knew they, who fare upon the Elephants, which way to turn them ; for on all sides they received wounds, and were not able to require them with the like. In this extremity there appeared brave Troops of Horse and Foot, that came unexpected to the rescue ; and charging the assailants upon the back, drove them to seek their own safety by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes ; who though he knew not what his Adversary meant to do, yet he knew very well what was fittest for him to do : and therefore playing both games himself, provided the remedy.

§. V.

The Conspiracy of Peucestes and others, against Eumenes his Life.

By these means Eumenes won great Honour, and was by the whole Army acknowledged a most expert General, and well worthy of the chief Command. But Peucestes, and the other Captains, guilty of their own much insufficiency, were so transported with envy, that they could now no longer contain their vile thoughts, but held communication, as upon a necessary point, how they might find means to murder him.

Surely, it is great injustice to impute the mischief, contrived against worthy men, to their own pride, or some other ill deserving : For, should it often happen, that small vices do serve to counterpoise great virtues ; (the sense of evil being more quick and lasting, than of good) yet he shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimony, will think it a part of wisdom to find good reason of the evil, done to virtuous men, which oftentimes have no other cause than their virtue it self. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtesy, of a very sweet conversation among his friends, and careful by all gentle means to win their love, that seemed to bear him any secret ill affection. It was his meek virtue that overthrew him, which even they that fought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he should not be slain, before the Battle were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be governed by his directions. Of this Treason, he was quickly adverted by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he used to borrow money when he needed not, to the end that they should be careful of his good, for fear of losing their own. Considering therefore, and discounting with himself of the Villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secret : which done, he resolved many things in his mind ; being doubtful what course were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill-affected to the Royal Blood, excepting those which were with him, that were more fit number, than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seek their help, that needed his. To make his own peace with Antigonus, had been against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbore, either to lose the Battle willingly, or to fly into Cappadocia, and make shift for himself among his old friends. At length he resolved to do his best against the common Enemy, and afterwards to look to himself as well as he might.

§. VI.

The last Battle between Antigonus and Eumenes.

The Soldiers, especially those old Bands of the Silver-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the Victory, but only to bring them into the Field, and set them in array ; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacrity was generally found in the common Soldiers faces ; but the chief Commanders were so mischievously bent against him, that they could not endure to think upon being beholding to him for the Victory. Yet he ordered the Battle to well, that, without their own great fault, they could hardly fail of getting the upper hand.

Before the Armies came to joining, a Horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice to the followers of Antigonus. That their wickedness, in fighting against their own Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vain. For the Silver-shields were men of threescore or seventy years old, strengthened more by continual exercise, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that Fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to try their last hope with these resolute Warriors, the most ancient and best regarded of all Alexander's Soldiers) grew very panish, and advanced heavily, suspecting their own cause, and fearing that the threatnings uttered would prove true.

Antigonus was now again far the stronger in Horse, which gave him cause of great hope ; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plain levelled Field. Placing therefore himself and his Son Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Pyrrhus, he did set forward courageously against the Enemies, that were ready to give him a sharp entertainment.

Eumenes took unto him Ptolemy, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his Battle, in the face of Antigonius, meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all means to make head against him on the sudden, and (withal) to give proof of his own valour, which perhaps he should no more do, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, opposite unto Pyrrhus, he bestowed the weakest of his Horse and Elephants, under one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the Fight, and make a leisureable retreat, expecting the event of the other side.

So they joyned very fiercely; Antigonius, labouring to make himself Master of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to win such a Victory upon his open Enemies, as might give him leisure and opportunity to deal with his false Friends.

The Foot-men of Antigonius, being, even in their own opinions, far inferior to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Silver-shields, who slew above five thousand of them, losing of their own, not one man. But in Horse, Eumenes was so over-matched, that he could not repel Antigonius, who pressed him very hard, but was fain to stand wholly upon defence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground upon him, until such time as Ptolemy, with one thousand five hundred Horse, withdrew himself out of the Battle, leaving his Companions fighting to defend his back.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his Enemies, labouring to break open the way unto Antigonius himself. And though he failed of his purpose; yet with great slaughter he did so bear upon them, which came in his way, that the Victory hung a long time in suspense, uncertain which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandy mould, through the trampling of Horses, Men, and Elephants, did cast up such a cloud of dust, as hindered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonius finding this advantage, dispatched away some Companies of Horse, that passed undiscovers beyond Eumenes his Battels, and came to his Carriages, which lay about half a mile from the place of Fight, slenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Army lay between them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Ptolemy retired himself no further than unto the Carriages, he might not only have defended them, but peradventure have surprized those which came to surprize them, and so have done as good a piece of service as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event: and Eumenes was so over-laboured both in body and mind, that he could not give an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonius had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himself every way over-charged, began to give back, and withdrew himself and his Companies in good order, to the other side of the Battle, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from loss. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well contented to let him depart quietly, and withed not to see him come again; as fain he would have done.

The loss of the Carriages was reported unto him, as soon as he had any leisure to hear how things went; whereupon he presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Ptolemy that was not far off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the Fight, whereby he trusted, not only to recover their own Goods, but to enrich themselves with the Spoils of the Enemies. Ptolemy not only refused to joyn with him, but immediately withdrew himself into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this, the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to return into their Camps. Yet Antigonius conceived hope of doing somewhat more; and therefore taking half his Horse-men, he waited upon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other half he committed to Pyrrhus, willing him to set upon the Silver-shields in their retreat; which yet he forbore to do, because it appeared too full of danger. So the Battle ended; wherein Antigonius had not so much the better in Horse, as the word in Foot: but the spoil which he got, by surprizing his Enemies Carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

§. VII.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonius, and slain.

Eumenes, coming into his Camp, and finding the Silver-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheer them up, and put them in hope of recovering all with advantage. For their brave demeanour that day had so crushed the Enemy, that he had no power left wherewith to abide them in open Field, and was much less able to draw their Carts after him, through that great Wilderness, over the high Mountains.

But these persuasions availed nothing. Ptolemy was gone; the other Captains would needs return into the high-Countreys; and the Souldiers had no desire either to fly or to fight, but only to recover their Goods. Wherefore Tentamus, one of the two Captains of the Silver-shields, (who had in former times readily consented unto traitorous motions, in hope of gain, but was letted by his partner Antigonius) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making himself great, and winning the love of those Bands, dealt secretly with Antigonius, requesting him to restore unto those old Souldiers their Goods, which he had taken, being the only reward of their Services in the Wars of Philip, and Alexander.

Antigonius, as a subtil man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with a little entreaty perform a great deal more than they promised; and therefore he lovingly entertained the Messengers, filling them with hopes of greater matters than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make War against him. This Answer pleased them so well, that they forthwith devised how to deliver him alive. Wherefore coming about him, as at other times, to do their duty, and pretending more joy of their victory, than sorrow of their loss, which they said they would redeem by another Fight; in the midst of this goodly talk they leapt upon him, caught hold of his Sword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away; and stopping their ears against all persuasions, would not yield so far, as to loosen one of his hands and let him kill himself, but brought him alive (that was their own General, under whom they had obtained many Victories) as it had been in triumph, into the Camp of their Enemies.

The press of men, running out of the Camp to see him, was so great, that Antigonius was fain to send a guard of Horse-men and Elephants, to keep him from being smothered, whom he could not suddenly resolve either to kill or save. Very few were they that sued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the Son of Antigonius was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saved, he would soon be the chief in great reputation, for his great ability. So after long deliberation, Antigonius concluded, that it was the safest way to put him to death; which intending to have done by Famine (perhaps because he would keep it a while in his own power to reverse the Sentence, as desiring (if it might be) to have him live his Friend) halfe of other business made him do it by the Sword.

To this end came all the Travels of the worthy General, Eumenes; who had with great wisdom, fidelity, and patience, laboured in vain, to uphold the Family which God had purposed to cast down. He is reckoned among the notable Examples of Fortunes mutability, but more notable was his government of himself in all her changes. Adversity never lessened his courage, nor Prosperity his circumspection. But all his Virtue, Industry, and Wit, were cast away, in leading an Army, without full power to keep it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill, answered by Galpar de Coligny, Admiral of France, in our days, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soon after in the Massacre of Paris; That rather than to lead again an Army of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonius himself gave to the Body of Eumenes honourable Funeral; and rewarded the Traitor, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chief Captain of the Silver-shields he burnt alive; many of the other Captains he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-shields, that had betrayed to worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader, that should carry them into far Countreys, under pretence of Wars; but with a privy charge, to consume them all, as perjured wretches, letting none of them return alive unto his Friends and Kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas, that beat upon the shoars of Greece and Macedonia.

§. VIII.

How Antigonius slew Python, and occupied Media. How he removed Governours of Provinces, and made himself Lord of Persia, carrying away Ptolemies.

The two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter; the common Souldier idly; the principal men intently bent unto the business ensuing. Pyrrhus began to consider his own deservings; for that the whole War had been chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Province. Besides, he thought himself as good a man as Antigonius, unless it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged easy to be purchased with gifts, and therefore feared not to atlay them with great liberality. But in following this course, he was driven by necessity to trust many, of whom he stumbled upon some, that were unfeared, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discovered to Antigonius, who (nothing like to Pyrrhus) dissembled his Indignation, and rebuked the Informers, as breeders of Diffusion between him, and his honourable Friend, unto whom he meant to commit the government of all those Countreys: his own business calling him into the lower Asia. These Reports, coming daily to his ears, did finely delude Pyrrhus. By his greatness with Alexander, his Authority in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Governour; and the love of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintain, even an offensive War. But what need had he to use the Sword, when he was likely without contention, to obtain more than his own asking? Therefore he came as soon as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonius, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing less than to yield to any such division. As soon as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slain out of hand. For Antigonius, having begun with Eumenes his ancient Friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old Acquaintance, from cutting down indifferently all that stood in his way: but swam carelessly through the blood, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this business was ended, he appointed a new Governour in Media, to order the Province; and a Captain, to suppress all Commotions: thinking belike, that the Power and Authority, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were derived.

After this, he marched into Persia, where he was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to show how well he understood his own mightiness. For he placed and displaced, at his pleasure, Governours in all Provinces; leaving none in Office, that were not his own Creatures, excepting such as lay too far off to be dilogged easily.

Ptolemy, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheer to redeem old offences; but was deceived; having to do with one that could not be taken with such baits: he was carried away, and treated with goodly words of promise, that never took effect. Thus he, that envied the virtue of his Friend, was driven to flatter (in vain) the fortune of his Enemy; after which he lived a contemptible life, till he died obscurely a man forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon, by Antigonius. The great Riches of Antigonius.

Seleucus was the next in this Visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good-will to Antigonius, and now gave proof of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captain of the Castle of Susa to meet him on the way, rendering unto him that strong Piece, and all the Treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonius (though having in his hands the Keeper of the Place) could hardly believe it; but used him with excessive kindness, for fear of good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the Treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of money, made up twenty five thousand Talents. Having all this, he might well account himself a happy man, if Riches were sufficient to Happiness. But large Dominion was the Mark at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leave no Country behind his back, that should not acknowledge him for Sovereign Lord. Coming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of Love, and honoured with Presents, becoming the Majesty of a King. All this he accepted with great Gravity, as being due to him, and began to require an account of the Revenues of that Province. This demand Seleucus held unreasonable; saying, that it was not needful for him to render unto any man an account of that Province which was given unto him, in respect of his many good Services to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerful; who urged him daily to come to a Reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of Money, nor any other Necessity moved Antigonus to press him thus, but only the desire to pick matter of quarrel against him, whereof it was likely that he should find such issue as Pytho and Peneustes had done. Therefore taking with him only fifty Horse, he conveyed himself away, and fled into Protemius Dominions, desiring him to protect him from the violence of such a man, as went about to oppress all, that in former times had been his Masters, or at least his Equals. Antigonus was glad of his Flight; for now all those Countries were yielded unto him without Batrel, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence, and to kill him it was not his desire, having received many Benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Caldeans brought a strange Prophecy to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himself, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recover Babylon, yea, win all Asia, and kill Antigonus in Batrel. Easy believers may give credit to this Tale. Had it been true, methinks Antigonus rather should have hanged those Caldeans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than sent Pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the Destinies preserved for so great purposes. When he had settled things at Babylon, he took his Journey into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he took up ten thousand Talents more of the Kings Treasures, and casting his Accounts, found his yearly Income to amount unto eleven thousand Talents.

Of the great Civil War between Alexanders Captains: and how they assumed the Name and State of Kings.

§. I.

The Combination of Ptolemy, Cassander, and others, against Antigonus. Their Demands, and his Answer.

THIS great Riches, and the rest of his Power, made Antigonus dreaded, envied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his own accord he seemed like to yield unto. Of their Practices he had some notice; the good entertainment given unto Seleucus, giving him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them severally, entreating them to continue firm in their Love toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold Answers which they made occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolemy, it being likely that a good Army should prevail more than a fair Message. Therefore, as soon as the Season of the year would permit, he took the way toward Syria, and was encountered by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoice at his Victory obtained against Eumenes their common Enemy, and the Honour that he had thereby gotten. In which War, so far as for as they being his Confederates, must have endured great loss, with hazard of their whole Estates, if the contrary Faction had prevailed; they held it very just, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that Voyage, wherein they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making between them all an equal division of the Treasures that were in his hands (a thing easy to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the Rate of his new Purchases. This might best be to every ones liking, if he would make over Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering upon the Hellestons, to Lysimachus; for whereas his own Dominions were to much extended Eastward by his late Victory, he might well spare some of those Western Provinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolemy, he would not crave any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Provided always, that Seleucus their common Friend, and Partner in the late War, might be restored to his own, out of which he had been driven to injuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly Consent unto their Demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtain with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, he should yet be able to redeem Peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad Friends, for fear only, left it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to find them Work, more than enough to defend their own. Therefore, he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men. Profits of that Victory, which he alone, without other mens help had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, having by his means kept their Governments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polyperchon, and the Council of Estate in Macedon. But what marvel was it, if they considered not how he had saved them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when coming to him as a Fugitive, and begging succour, he was by his meer Bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those days command me to surrender Provinces, and give him his equal share of my Treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired me to pity him, and help him against his Enemies; which I did, by lending him an Army and Fleet, on confidence whereof, he now pretends to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can he complain of Wrong, that durst not stay to plead his Right? I did use him well; but his Conscience told him that he had deserved ill: else he would not have fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their own, which some of them can hardly justify. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolemy's Proceedings; and after him, to deal with others, if they continue to provoke me.

The Preparations and beginnings of the Wars.

WHEN the Embassadors were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought upon but War. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europe, as soon as he were entered into Syria, left his Nephew Ptolemy to guard the Seacoasts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giving him also in charge, to drive out of Cappadocia some that were already sent over to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not unfurnished of Money, to draw Friends to his side, and raise up Troubles to his Enemies. Especially he laboured to make himself the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than forewore his Journey into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent Commodities for building of a Navy. Therefore, having erected Beacons, and laid Post-Houses throughout all Asia, to give swift advertisement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any Power sufficient to maintain the Field.

Ptolemy lay in Aegypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honoured of all the People as their natural Lord: his other Provinces he kept with a few Garrisons, better serving to contain the People within obedience, than to confront a foreign Enemy. So Antigonus took many Cities and Places of that Country, and began to set great numbers of Artificers on work in making Ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a year and three months; not idly. For he took Teppe and Gaza, which were yielded unto his discretion, and well used. The strong City of Tyrrus held out long, but was compelled in the end, by Famine, to render it self upon composition, that Protemius Soldiers might depart with their Arms, which was permitted.

Ptolemy was not asleep whilst these things were in doing, though he kept himself within the bounds of Aegypt, as indeed it behoved him to do. His Forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plain Field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Nevertheless by Sea (where his Enemy was as yet unready) he sent his Fleet into all Quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chief command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred Sail along the Coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus and his Army, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then governed by many petty Lords, of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolemy; the rest were, by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with Gold, but now redeemed by the Aegyptian with sharp Steel.

The same Commodity of Aid by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also Cassander), but not the Son of Antipater, howsoever by the painful and learned Writer Reimerus Reineccius, he is by some over-sight counted for the same) to declare for Ptolemy and his Confederates, and busily employ in their Quarrel all his Forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed rest; but now he threw himself into dangerous War, choosing rather to undergo trouble at home, than to fall under certain ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

§. III.

How each Party sought to win the Assistance of Greece. Antigonus his Declaration against Cassander. Alexander the Son of Polyperchon revolveth from Antigonus, who had set him up.

IN the mean season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure unto them the People of Greece, whose Aid, which way soever it inclined was of great importance. Herein at the first Antigonus sped so well by large effusion of his Treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedaemonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom he waged eight thousand, and caused Polyperchon (who had had a good while made hard shifts) to rowle himself again, and taking upon her Body the Title of Captain of Peloponnesians, to make head against Cassander.

These hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kind. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, he called together both his own Souldiers, and all the Greeks and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, That Cassander had very cruelly slain Olympias, Mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had shut up in close Prison the poor Lady Roxane, Alexanders Wife, and his Son begotten on her Body. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himself King over the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Thestsalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a Match unfit for a man of no greater Parentage than he, to join with him in Marriage. That in meer despite of those dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own Name Cassandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great Treason of the Inhabitants, was levelled with the Ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons he required them them to make a Decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute Liberty the Lady Roxane and her Son, and should yield Obedience to the Lord Lieutenant General of the Empire (by which Name Antigonus himself was understood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into Freedom; this he did, not because he was careful of their Good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was persuaded, that not only the Greeks would adhere unto him, as to their loving Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the Rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardless of nothing but his own Benefit, would correct their Opinion, and think him the most faithful of all others to the Royal Blood. But concerning his Loyalty to the young Prince, the World was too wise to be deceived with vain flows. His undertaking for the Liberty of the Greeks was more effectual, and got easie belief, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Prology strove to be as earnest as he, making the like Decree, in hope to win to himself that Valiant Nation, which afforded him far more serviceable in War, than were to be found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point, at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceived himself, not without great cost. For he gave to Alexander the Son of Polyperchon five hundred Talents, willing him to fight the War on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appear, that on his side was meant nothing else than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassander's men had, with much Blood-shed, grievously afflicted the contrary Faction; and he himself perceiving that they were more easily spoiled as Enemies, than retained as Friends, thought it the best way, to make what use he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnished with plenty of Gold, wherewith he was able, not only to win the doubtful, but to corrupt such as might seem best assured: he thought it a good part of Wisdom, to surrender upon fair Conditions, that which he could not assure himself to hold any long time by force. Therefore, he sent one to deal with Alexander, about the matters in controversy; letting him know that Antigonus was very skillful in setting men together by the ears, not caring who prevailed, but only desiring to have them weary themselves, whilst he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set upon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were to wife, as to keep in his Purse the five hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus; it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander: provided, that he should from thenceforth renounce all Confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithful League with Prology, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise, he might well periwade himself, that the Country which his Father could not keep, when he was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be won by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, to fill him; but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these Wars; among whose Followers it was not hard to discover the intent

(which he did not carry very secret) of making himself absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soon entreated to accept to good an offer; and did not stick to enter into that League, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subject unto no mans Controul.

Howbeit this his Honour continued not long ere he lost both it and his Life together, by treason of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were soon after vanquished in Battle by Cratespolis, Alexander's Wife, a discreet and valiant Lady. She in revenge of her Husbands Death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in Fight; and having by severity taught them Obedience, did afterwards contain her Army in good order, and governed those places that she held with the Love and Commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

§. IV.

The Ætolians rise against Cassander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A Fleet and Land-army of Antigonus utterly defeated by Prology's Lieutenant. In what terms the War stood at this time. Antigonus draws near to Greece.

Antigonus, when he found that with so much money he had only bought an Enemy, began to raise Troubles to Cassander and his other Adversaries in Greece, by stirring up the Ætolians against them; likewise he laboured to win to his Party the Islands in the Greek Seas, by whose assistance he might be the better able to deal with Prology, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong Fleet. But neither of these Attempts had the success which he expected. The Ætolians, a factious Nation, and always envying the greatness of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their Gains equalled not their Losses. Cassander was some of their own Countries; forsook the Acarnanians against them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Epirians, whom he vanquished in Battle, to forsake their side, and bind himself to bear no Arms against Cassander's Friends.

On the other side, as many petty Islands were drawn to joyn with Antigonus: to the Fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admiral to Antigonus, passing along the Coast of Asia toward Cyprus, with an Army under conduct of Perilaus, marching on the Shore for mutual assistance, was quite overthrown by Prology's Navy. Polyclitus, who in Prologies behalf had been sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his service in that Country, because Alexander was come over to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these *Antigoni*ans held, whom he very cunningly surprized. He rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the Enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, wherinto Perilaus falling, was taken Prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slain, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admiral perceiving this, made all haste to help his Fellows that were on Land; but whilst he with all his Fleet were intentive only to that business, Polyclitus appeared at their backs, who as soon as he perceived their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behind, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill Tidings caused Antigonus to deal with Prology about some composition. First, he sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in Person. But Antigonus would not yield unto the Demands of Prology, to the Parly was vain.

Hitherto each part seemed to have indifferently sped in the War, and thereby to have equal cause of hope and fear. This late Victory, with the good success of his Affairs in Cyprus, did seem to make amends to Prology for his Losses in Syria. Likewise the Revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the Confederacy made between the Ætolians and him; as also those petty Skirmishes, that had been in Asia the less, to Antigonus his advantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but adverse to him; and by the Troubles brought upon his Estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the loss of his Men, Money, and Ships, no otherwise than as the paring of his Nails that were left long enough, and would easily grow again; but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed upon a Limb of Prology his Enemy, and strengthened the Body of his own Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoise the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them that want no Money.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his Enemies upon Asia the less; wherein, though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to fear, lest the People, being tied unto him by no Bond of Allegiance, might upon small occasion revolt from him, to men of as honourable Reputation as he himself. To prevent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in Person, where his Affairs did seem to prosper the worse, by reason of his Absence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria, under his Son Demetrius, to whom, being then but two and twenty years old, he appointed many ancient Captains as Assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to Winter.

§. V.

How Lyfimachus and Cassander vanquished some Enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good success of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the Rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

The coming of Antigonus into those parts wrought a great alteration in the Process of his business thereabouts. For his Enemies had short leisure to think upon molesting him in Asia; they themselves were held over-hardly to their own Work on Europe side. Scutber, a King of the Thracians, joyning with some Towns that rebelled against Lyfimachus, brought also the bordering Sythians into the Quarrel. All these relied upon Antigonus, who was to help them with Money and other Aid. The Ætolians likewise took Courage, and rose against Cassander, having Æacides, lately restored to the Kingdom of Epirus, their Assistant. But Lyfimachus gave unto his Rebels no time to confirm themselves. He suddenly presented himself before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by fear to return to their Duty.

He fought a Battle with the Sythians, and wild Thracians, and drove them out of the Country. Finally, he overcame Scutber; and following the heat of his Victory, slew Pasarnias in Battle; whom Antigonus had sent over with an Army; and all his men he did either put to Ranfome, or fill up with them his own Bands. The like success had Philip, Cassander's Lieutenant against the Ætolians. For he wasted their Country; fought with the Epirotes that came to help them; and after the Victory, fought again with their forces joyned in one, overthrowing them, and killing Æacides, that unfortunate King. Finally, he drove the Ætolians out of most of their Country, and forced them to seek their safety among the wild Mountains. Of the Epirotes he sent as Prisoners to Cassander, the principal Authors of the Kings Restitution, and of the present War.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his Adversaries with painful Travail; after which, they remained only Savers. Antigonus himself at fair leisure won all Caria the whilst, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing Liberty upon all the Cities he took out of Cassander's hands. The whole Country of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Eubœa, and many places of the firm Land were by these means won to be his in true and vehement Affection, ready to do or suffer any thing for him that had made so evident a demonstration of his readiness to give them the liberty indeed, which others promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would fain have shewed their good Will; but they were kept in by Cassander's Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if he would pass over into Macedon: by which terror he forced Cassander to repair thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Towns of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselves, if any forraign Succour appeared. The Aid which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenants of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassander's Departure, entred the Country; drove his Garrisons out of divers Cities; forced the Governour of Athens to enter into League with their Lord; won the Cittadel of Thebes, and set the People at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before been raised out of her old Ruines by the meer Power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had been some heinous Crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the Love of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thank the Increaser, than the Author of their Good; and rather to look forward upon those Hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward upon their miserable Nullity, that held them incapable of being any thing.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great Battel at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus won, against Demetrius the Son of Antigonus.

As the preference or nearness of Antigonus gave life to his Affairs, so the lower Alexa, and Greece; to the designs of his Enemies, taking advantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those Kingdoms. Whereas in the Eastern parts, wherewith in the year preceding he had over-topped them. The life of Cyprus, whose Princes wavred between contrary Affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their Covenant with Ptolemy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolemy, in his own person, easily reduced them to a more failed order, putting some to death, carrying others away Prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Governour of the whole Country. With the same Fleet he ran alongst the Sea-coasts, waiting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoils of which he enriched his followers, and returned laden to Cyprus. Demetrius the Son of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the Miseries, wherewith his Fathers Subjects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and light-armed Foot with him, because the busyness required expedition. But in vain did he see himself and his followers, in hasty seeking of one, that by launching out into the deep could in a short space delude the labour of so many days, if need had to be required. Answerable to the necessity of this Expedition was the fortune of the contrary of this certain, whether Demetrius or Ptolemy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether having lightened his Ships of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return upon those maritime Countreys; or make reward Syria, where his coming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was deserting a royal Army, which he levied with all convenient speed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was fain to choise out of uncertainties the most likelihood, and return the way that he came, with all his Companies, which were fitter for Service in the open Field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. He had scarce retired his Men and Horses in Syria, when the news arrived of Ptolemy's coming with a puissant Army, to give him Battel. Hereupon he called to counsel his principal Friends, who advised him to give way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future: being a young man, and weakly furnished with means to resist such ancient and famous Generals Ptolemy and Seleucus. This counsel seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gave life, than from any necessity growing out of the present business. For Demetrius considering himself to be the Son of Antigonus, and now General of his Father's Army, thought his own title weighty enough to be laid in balance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Besides, he found he much insufficient. His men were better exercised than the Enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore persuading himself, that such odds of number, and of great fame, would rather serve to adorn his Victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to trial, without expecting the advantage of more help. So animating his Soldiers with hope of spoil and rewards, he abode the coming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soon as they had finished their wearisome Journey over the Defarts of Arabia.

Phrolomy and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Province, as Egypt, came to well provided of all Necessaries, that their Army felt not any great Grievance of the evil way, when Bartel was presented them, which confidently they undertook. In all things else they had the odds of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided. But how to deal with those Beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kind of Pallisado, lashed together with chains, and sharpened in such manner, that the Elephants could not seek to break up on it, without receiving much hurt. The rest of their Forces, which (besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate Services, by them performed that year, whilst the Enemies had wearied themselves, either with vain Journeys, or long and dulling expectation, they disposed in such order, as best answered to the form, wherein Demetrius was embattled. The Fight began, and was maintained with equal courage, for a long time, each part striving more to win honour, than to satisfy any other passion, as having little cause of hatred, or revenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who upon no necessity would needs fight a Battle with disadvantage, began to appear by his losses. He had committed himself to Fortune, having more to lose by her than he could get: but in this Fight she was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; unless it may be said, that the terror brought upon his men, by the loss of his Elephants, was bad luck. Those Beasts were in that kind of War hardly to be refitted on plain ground, and perforce at the first they made great break amongst Phrolomy's men. Afterward seeking to spoil through the Pallisado, they were forely hurt, and every one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiving that all must lie upon their hands, who were ill able to make their own Places good, they began to shrink, and many of them to provide for their safety by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strove so long in vain to make his merit abide, that he himself was likely to be lost; he was fain to give place to the stronger, making a violent retreat as far as Acetes, which was about thirty miles from the place of Battle. A great part of his Carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his Company turned aside, hoping to save such Goods, as in haste they could pack up. This foolish covetousness was their destruction, and the loss of the Town. For whilst they, forgetful of the danger, had filled the Streets with lumber Horses, and cloyed up the Gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch, others, to carry out what they had already loaded, Phrolomy's Army brake in without resistance, taking them with their Goods and the City altogether.

This Victory reftored unto Prodomy the best part of Syria, a Province more caſſe in theſe Times to keep, than to keep; and opened the way unto all the greatness of Seleucus. For between Gaza and Phœnicia no Place offered reſiſtance. In Calydny and Phœnicia, ſome Towns held out a while, but were ſoon taken in by Prodomy. Among theſe were the great Cities of Tyrry and Sidon; of which Sidon was given up by the Inhabitants; Tyrry by the Garrifon, falling to mutiny againſt their Captain; who truſting to the ſtrength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolemy, and honourably entertained in respect of his fidelity.

§. VII.

*How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himself Lord of many Countreys in the bigger Asia.
The Era of the Kingdom of the Greeks, which began with this Dominion of Seleucus.*

While Ptolomy followed his business with such prosperity, Seleucus took leave of him, and went up to Babylon, to try his own fortune; which he found so favourable, that recovering first his own Province, he became at length Master of the better part of Alexander's Purchases.

This Expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of unlikelihoods. His Train consisted of no more than a number too small, to have been placed as Garrison, in some one of those main great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needful, to make way into strong Places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the Walls. The Name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Governour, that none of them would find courage to resist him; but left that work to Antigonus his own men, withing them ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countreys, had the like affection; others made a countenance of War, which by ease compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensigns. This added courage to the people, who came in space, and submitted themselves joyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so general, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Towns of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily Enemies, in his own Lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the Field, and try the matter by Fight. But the Treason of one principal man, who revolted to the Enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that they did no more than seek to make good one strong Place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those Quarters. This Castle, be-like, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly took it; and so got the entire possession of Macedonia and Babylon.

Zenigum had bestowed in Media and Perſia, Forces convenient for defence of thoſe Provinces, that were the utmoſt of his Dominion. In theſe Countreys about Euphrate he had not done that like: for his own great Army lay between them and all Enemies. Thereſore when the Victory at Gaza, had opened unto Sелеucus the way into thoſe Parts, he found little impediment in the reſt of his buſineſs. Having now gotten what he fought for, it behoved him to look how he might keep his gettings: for his own Forces were too ſmall, and his Friends weſſible able to lend him any more. That which his Friends could not do for him, his Enemies did. Nicator, to whom Zenigum had committed his Army in Media, joining unto himſelf ſome of Perſia and other Countreys, all needfull help came with ten thouſand Foot, and ſeven thouſand Horſe, able to fave all from being loſt, or to drive Sелеucus out of that which he had won.

Against this Power, Seleucus had only four hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foot, wherewith to oppose himself: his large conquest of unwarlike Nations having yielded him many loving Subjects, but few Soldiers. Therefore when his Enemies were near to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himself from the Place where his Resistance was expected, into certain Marishes not far off; where he lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nemour thought that he had been fled, and was the less careful in fortifying his Camp. In return for this vain security, his Camp was taken by surprize, the first night of his arrival: the Savages, or Lieutenant of Perfia, together with sundry of the Captains, were slain, he himself was driven to flee for his life into the Defarts; and the whole Army yielded unto Selencus: whose gentle demourner, after the Victory, drew all Media, Sylsiana, and the neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord, without any further stroke of Armes.

This Victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new style, of The Kingdom of the Greeks, an account much used by the Jews, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those Parts. I will not make any long dissertation about the first year of this Æra. The Authority of that great Astrologer Ptolemy, from which, there is no appeal, makes it plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth year of Nabonassar, was the first year of this Æra.

bannular, was the fourscore and two year of Nabonassar, comp. Other Inference hereupon is needless, than L. Gauricius that Note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these years was reckoned complete at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight years after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Sa- turn, recorded by Ptolemy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bursing; finding the same Planet to have been to placed in the Sign of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the same year; which was from Nabonnassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Sileucum the fourscore and two year; and the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These Observations of the celestial Bodies, are the surest marks of Time: from which he that wilfully varies, is execrable. As for such occurrences in History, and the years of succeeding Princes (that are not seldom ambiguous, by reason of unremembered fractions) if they seem to be here-against, it is not greatly material.
Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these years of the Greeks, were not reckoned in all Countreys from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the several Authors of the two Books of the Maccabees, who follow divers accounts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolemy, may apply the other supputations thereto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

§. VIII.

How Ptolemy lost all that he had won in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed unto the Macedonians, by those that had been subject unto the Persian Empire. Of divers petty Enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill success.

IN a happy hour did Seleucus adventure, to go up to Babylon, with so few men as his Friend could then well spare: for had he stayed longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Proomy could have spared him none at all, Demetrius the Son of Antigonus, having lost the Battel at Gaza, received from Proomy all his own Goods, his Pages, and Servants, in free gift, and therewithal a courteous message, message, to this effect: That no person hated was the ground of this War, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only terms of Honour, wherein they would seek to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrel, should not be forgotten.

This noble dealing of Protemius, did kindle in Demetrius, an earnest desire of requiring him with some as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken Troops; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabout; and advertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to lend a new supply, where-with he might redeem his Honour lost. Antigonus, upon the first news of this overthrow, had said, That the Victory, which Protemius was upon a beardless Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon desire that his Son, whom he tenderly loved, should amend his own Reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Protemius hearing of Demetrius his Preparations, did nevertheless follow his own business in Cylogria; thinking it enough, to send part of his Army under Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had been already vanquished, when their Forces were entire. This peradventure would have been sufficient, had not Cilles too much undervalued the power of such an Enemy. He thought that this young Gallant, having lately saved his life by flight, would now be more careful of having a fair way at his back, than adventurous in setting further forward, than urgent reason should provoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all fear; as one that were already Master of the Field, and should meet with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careless March, he took the lightest of his Army, and made his Journey with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilles unexpected, and was on the sudden, without any Battle, Master of his Camp: taking him alive, with his Soldiers, and their Carriages all at once.

This Exploit served not only to repair the Credit of Demetrius, which his loss at Gaza had almost ruined; but further it enabled him, to recompense the Bounty of Protemius, with equal Favour, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his Friends, accompanied with rich Presents. But neither was Protemius so weakened by this loss, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Protemius; and therefore he fortified himself in Places of advantage: Protemius on the other side was loath to engage himself in an Enterprize, wherein he might perceive, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driven to make a shameful retreat, or a dangerous adventure of his whole Estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeed, was nothing lost in his way towards Syria; whether he made all haste, not so much to relieve his Son, as to embrace him. For he rejoiced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquired himself, and being left to his own advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late Victory, he brought such Forces, as might serve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, should be referred unto the good foundation, laid by his Son; whom from this time forwards, he employed in matters of greatest importance.

Protemius had now less reason, to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to have afflicted the Camp of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of Confolitation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captains advised him to retire into Egypt; alleging many good Arguments, to that purpose: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good success against Perdiccas, in the like defensive War. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his Honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any sudden passion of fear: and he departed at fair leisure, not only carrying his Treasures along with him, but staying to dismember some principal Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his back, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easy was it in those Times, for the Captain of a strong Army, to make himself Lord of a great Province.

We may justly wonder, that these Kingdoms of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the Victory of Alexander had over-run, with so hasty a course, as gave him little leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not only by himself, but by the Captains of his Army after him. The hot Contentions for superiority between the King of Israel, and those of Damascus between Egypt, and Babylon; Babylon, and Nineve; the Perfians, and many Countreys; argue a more manly temper, to have once been in those people; which are now so patient of a foreign yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and again recovered, by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their own Heads, but were born to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more strange; if we shall consider, how the several States of Greece (many of which had never possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their Spirits to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of liberty: and how these proud Conquerors were glad to offer it, desiring to have them rather Friends than Servants, for fear of further inconvenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countreys, had always been subject unto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords; whom the Babylonians and Perfians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of foreign Masters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home-born Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Perfian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all sovereign power, or high authority (the life and spirit of every Estate) they lay as dead, and were bereaved of motion, when that Kingdom fell, whereof they lately had been members.

Why the Perfian Satrapae, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains, after the death of Alexander, strive to lay hold upon those Provinces, which had many Ages been subject unto them, and scarce four years in quiet possession of their Enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible Name of that great Conqueror did cease to afflict them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossess them of their new Purchases: it is a question, wherein, who is not satisfied, may find no less reason to suspect the History, than Authority to confirm it. For we seldom read, that any small King, dom, prevailing against a far greater, hath made so entire a Conquest, in the compass of ten years, as left unto the vanquished no hope of recovery, nor means to rebel; especially when such disorders, or rather utter confusion hath ensued, by the furor of Civil War among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Perfian Empire, is well set down by Machiavel; and concerns all other Kingdoms, that are subject unto the like form of Government: the sum whereof is this. Wheresoever the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of slaves; there is the conquest easy, and soon assured: Where an Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to win all, and harder to keep that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdom of France. If any Invader should prevail for upon Turky, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he useth not to suffer alive) were taken or slain: the whole Empire would quickly be won, and easily kept, without any danger of Rebellion. For the Baishas, how great soever they may seem, are meer slaves; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personal regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, where in hope of private gain, should not countervail all apparent matter of fear. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a Conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children, though he further got the better part of the Countrey, and were by far the strongest in the Field. For, besides the Princes of the Royal Blood, there are in that Kingdom store of great men; who are mighty in their several Countreys, and having certain Royalties and Principalities of their own, are able to raise War, in all quarters of the Realm; whereunto the remembrance of their own ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will always fit them up and inflame them, so that until every one piece were won, and every one (an endless work) of the chief Nobility, brought under or destroyed, the Victory were not complete, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobility, doth oftentimes make way for an Invader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a fair entrance. But such Affiliants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten: for they look to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they soon return to their old allegiance, upon condition to keep what they have, unless they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himself. The Turks, on the other side, needs not to fear any peril, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principal men. The greatest mischief that any of them could work against him, were the betraying of some frontier Town, or the wilful loss of a Battle: which done, the Traitor hath spent his sting, and must either flee to the Enemy, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold, or else, in hope of doing some further harm, he must adventure to excuse himself unto his Master, who seldom forgives the Captain, that hath not striven by desperate valour, against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joining themselves unto any Invader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependants at all, other than such, as are subject unto them, by virtue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principal men, doth leave unto them no means, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so will it weaken both their power and their courage, in giving him assistance, if adversity should make him stand in need of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turks Baishas, or Provincial Governors, that knows either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the loss and utter ruin of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foot of his proper Inheritance, and it is the proper Inheritance of the Subject, which is also a Kingdom unto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conqueror, who hath no other device painted on his Ensign, than the Picture of Slavery.

As is the Turkish Empire, so was the Perfian, void of liberty in the Subjects, and utterly destitute of other Nobility, than such as depended upon the favour of the Prince. Some indeed there were of the Royal Blood, and others, descended from the Princes that joined with Darius; these were men of Reputation in Perfia; but their Reputation consisted only in their Pedigree, and their safety in not meddling with affairs of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Perfian Princes were held, it may appear by this, that the Kings Uncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and so did style themselves, in speaking unto these great Monarchs. That upon every light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaves; it is easy to be discerned, in that example of Crusty, practised by Xerxes upon his own Brother Majestes, which hath been formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satrapae, or Governors of the Provinces, it is needless to cite Examples, proving them to have been meer slaves: it may suffice, that their Heads were taken from them at the King's will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobility in Perfia, may be added the general want of Liberty convenient among the people: a matter no less available, in making easy and sure the Conquest of a Nation, than is the cause assigned by Machiavel. For as Aepus his Ass, did not care to run from the Enemies, because it was not possible, that they should load him with heavier burthens, than his Master caused him daily to bear: so the Nations, that endure the worst under their own Princes, are not greatly fearful of a foreign yoke; nor will be hasty to shake it off, if by experience they find it more light, than was that whereunto they had been long accustomed. This was it that made the Gallois bear such faithful affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian Jurisdiction in Lombardy; for the Towns that they wan, they wan out of the hands of tyrannous Oppressors: and this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had been subject unto the posterity of Alexander's followers, to serve the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that they were eased of many burthens, which had been imposed upon them by their own Kings.

So that of these tameness, which we find in those that had been Subjects of the Perfian Kings, the Reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been absolutely conquered by the Perfians. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: against whom Antiochus gens sent part of his Army, thinking therewith to bring them under; or rather to get a rich booty. The Captain that he sent fell upon the Nabatheans at such time as they were busied in a great Mart, wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrrh, Frankincense, and other such Commodities. All, or most of these rich Wares, together with five hundred Talents of Silver, and many Prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold upon: for their coming was sudden, and unexpected. But ere they could recover Syria, the Nabatheans overtook them, and finding them weary with long marches, made such a slaughter, that of four thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse, only fifty Horse escaped. To revenge this loss, Demetrius was sent out with a greater power: yet all in vain; for he was not resisted by any Army, but by the natural defence of a vast Wilderness, lack of Water, and of all things Necessary. Therefore he was glad to make Peace with them, wherein he lost not much Honour; for they craved it, and gave him Presents. Returning from the Nabatheans, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence he conceived hope of great profit that might be raised, by gathering the Sulphur. With this good Husbandry of his Son, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed men to the work; but they were slain by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These petty enterprizes, with the ill success accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage against Ptolemy: when the news of Seleucus his Victories in the High Countries, marred all together. For neither was the loss of those great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected; neither was it safe to transport the War into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Asia should have been exposed to the danger of ill affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius, with fifteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, was sent against Seleucus. These Forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his Son did less. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselves from necessity of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without setting in Garrison more men than he could spare; neither did he get much, and therefore was fain to let out the bravery of his expedition by burning and spoiling the Country; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were, acknowledge to belong unto his Enemy, who thenceforth held it as his own assured.

Antigonus had laid upon his Son a peremptory commandment, to return unto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seem) that in such an unsettled state of things, either the War might be ended, by the fury of the first brute; or else it would be vain to strive against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of Necessaries should frustrate the Valour, that by length of time was like to become less terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore, leaving behind him five thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, rather to make shew of continuing the War, than to effect much, where himself, with greater Forces, could do little more than nothing, forsook the enterprize, and went back to his Father.

A general Peace made and broken. How ill the Hopes of Alexander was destroyed.

These ambitious heads, having thus wearied themselves with uneffectual Travel, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold, were contented at length to come to an agreement; wherein it was concluded, That each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no private hatred, but mere desire of Empire had moved them to enter into the War, so was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dullness growing upon the slow advancement of their several hopes, that made them willing to breath a while, till occasion might better serve to fight again.

Besides that main point, Of retaining the Provinces which every one held, there were two Articles of the Peace, that gave a fair, but a false colour to the business: That the Son of Alexander by Roxane, should be made King, when he came to full Age; and, That all the Estates of Greece should be set at liberty. The advancement of young Alexander to his Fathers Kingdom, seems to have been a matter, forcibly extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose to make himself Lord of all. But this, indeed, more nearly touched Cassander. For in his custody was the young Prince and his Mother; neither did he keep them in so inalienable to their degree, but as close Prisoners, taken in that War, wherein they had seen the old Queen Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to have put them in possession of the Empire. The mutual hatred and fear between them, rooted in these grounds, of injuries done, and revenge expected; upon this conclusion of Peace, grew up faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander, who saw the Macedonians turn their favourable expectation towards the Son of their late renowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus, or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince must first have possession of Macedon; whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poor Office, of Captain over a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either do as they had done under Antidoteus; or better, as being better acquainted with their own strength. He in the mean time, by his readiness to acknowledge the true Heir, had freed himself from that ill-favoured imputation, of seeking to make himself Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greeks to their Liberty. This Liberty had hitherto been the subject of much idle discourse; but it never took effect. Antigonus held scarce any Town of theirs; Cassander occupied most of the Country: which if he should set free, he must be a poor Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrel against him, as against a Disturber of the common Peace.

In the mean season, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greek Seas, together with a great Army, and Money enough to entertain a greater, might serve to hold up the Credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes as high as ever they had been.

With much disadvantage do many men contend against one that is equal to them in all puissance, Cassander's Friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not do with all: for where every one

mans help is necessary to the War, there may any one make his own peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are weary. The best was, that he knew all their affections, which tended to no such end as the becoming Subjects unto any man; much less to the Son of an Asiatick Woman, of whom they had long since refused to hear mention. Therefore he took a short course, and caused both the Child and his Mother to be slain: raising thereby himself in a trice, from the dangerous necessity of yielding up his Government, which he must have done when the Child had come to Age. Roxane was a Lady of singular Beauty, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to have her Son, being as yet unborn, proclaimed Heir to the great Alexander. Immediately upon the death of Alexander, he had used the favour (if it were not love) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her own bloody malice, upon Statera, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custom of those Countries, wherein plurality of Wives is held no crime. For having by a counterfeit Letter, in Alexander's name, gotten this poor Lady into her hands, he did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled up with Earth. But now, by Gods just vengeance, were she and her Son made away, in the like secret fashion; even at such time, as the near approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer unto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander, was not so much deterred in outward shew, as inwardly it was pleasing unto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords of all that they had under them; fearing none other change of their Estates, than such as might arise by chance of War; wherein every one perwaded himself of success, rather better than work. Hereupon all of them (except Lyfmachus and Seleucus, that had work enough at home) began to route themselves; as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his own force. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busied in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont, while their Master was careful in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the Liberty of Greece; yet did the same Argument minister unto Ptolemy matter of Quarrel, against both him and Cassander. Ptolemy complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Towns, which ought, in fair dealing, to be set at liberty. Under colour of redressing this enormity, he sent an Army into Cilicia, where he won four Towns, and soon after lost them, without much labour of his own or his Enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the Coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that Voyage allured unto him a Nephew of Antigonus, (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requital of his Services) whom finding shortly, as false to himself, as he had been to his own Uncle, he was fain to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greeks at liberty, appeared not so plain, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the love of that valiant Prince, he made at the last an Expedition into Greece itself; where having set free some little Islands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised to great expectation of finishing the long desired work, that Cratesipolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polyperchon's Son, gave up into his hands the Towns of Cicyen and Corinth.

Ptolemy had conceived a vain belief, that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise up in Arms, whereby, with little labour, their liberty might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long servitude had well-near extinguished the ancient Valour of that Nation: and their ill Fortune, in many likely attempts to recover Freedom, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stir in pursuit thereof; but far tidly still, as wishing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedemonians, about these times, began to fortify their Town with Walls; trusting no longer in their virtue (for both it, and the discipline that upheld it, were too much impaired) that had been a Wall to their Town and Territory.

The Athenians were become as humble Servants, as they had been, in times past, insolent Masters; erecting as many Statues in honour of Demetrius Phalerus as there were days in their year. This Demetrius was now their Governour, and he governed them with much moderation; but in spite of other hearts, as being let over them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principal Cities, it is easy to gather, how the rest of the Country stood affected. Ptolemy could not get them to let their helping hands to their own good and to furnish him with the promised supplies, of Money and Victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thralldom; as judging the Commodity that would arise by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight, than the loss that Cassander should receive thereby, who could hardly retain them, if once Antigonus took the work in hand. But when he found such difficulty in the business, he changed his purpose; and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Syria and Corinth in his own possession.

Before the coming of Ptolemy into Greece, Cassander had been held occupied with very much work. For (besides his pains taken in Wars among barbarous Princes) he found means to allure unto himself the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont; making his own advantage of their discontentments. By the like skillful practice, he freed himself from a greater danger; and made those Murders which he had committed from the less odious, by teaching his Enemies to do the like. Old Polyperchon, that had made so great a stir in the Reign of Antidoteus, did after the death of Roxane and her Child, enter again upon the Stage, leading in his hand another Son of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barsine, the Daughter of Artabazus, a Persian; but had been less esteemed than the Son of Roxane; either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the favour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did bear unto Roxane. At this time, the death of his Brother, had moved such compassion, and regard of his being Alexander's only living Child, had procured unto him such good will, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his behalf, was deemed very just and honourable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that joined with this young Prince; yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him, that least ought, had not been most false. Cassander had raised an Army to withstand his entry into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Army, whose Wishes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he assayed Polyperchon himself with gifts and promises; wherever at length he prevailed so far, that the old Villain was contented to murder his Pupil, choosing rather with many curses, and fowl dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Army, than to purchase a Noble Fame with dangerous Travel, in maintaining his Faith unto both his dead and living Sovereigns.

Antigonus had not all this while been asleep, though his losses were hitherto the chief witness of his having been a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present, to retain his own; and therefore took order for the recovery of those places, which Proton had taken pains to win. As for the rest, it no way grieved him, to see Callander incur the general hatred of men, by committing those Murders, of which the profit was like to redound unto him, that was the most powerful: or to see Polyperchon and Proton swear in a huff War against Callander. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have afforded them leisure, and have thought the time well spent in beholding their contentions. For he was thoroughly perfwaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vain with long strife, his Armies and Treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all under. According to these haughty conceits, he demeaned himself among his followers; looking big upon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to revolt from him: but it was no great loss to be forsaken by those that looked with envious eyes upon that fortune, whereon their own should have depended.

Against this envy of his own men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedy, such as was like to give him a goodly Title to the whole Empire. Cleopatra, Sister unto Sardis, whom he had a great desire to take to Wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoever the disordered much willingness thereunto, yet was she in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for fear of being enforced. But it was not his purpose to get her by compulsive means; either because his fancy, being an old man, was not over violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could have made small use of her; by doing such apparent wrong. She had been married unto Alexander, King of Epirus, after whose death, she came to her Brother in Asia; hoping, belike, to find a new Husband in his Camp. But neither any of those brave Captains, that were, in times following, so hot in love with her, durst then aspire unto her Marriage: nor did her Brother, full of other cares, trouble himself with providing her of an Husband. She therefore, being a lusty Widow, suffered her Blood so far to prevail against her Honour, that she supplied the want of an Husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest; saying, that she was his Sister, and must be allowed this liberty, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay, in a manner, void, and the Portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had been; then did many seek to obtain her, while the her self desired only a proper man, with whom she might lead a merry life. To this purpose did she invite Leontius unto her; who made great haste, but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, he had her choice of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Proton, Lysimachus, and Callander, being all her earliest woors. All these (Antigonus excepted) had Wives already; Proton had many Wives, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his Wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kind. This hindered not his suit, peradventure it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra some hope of mutual toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her self, and was taking her Journey from Sardis towards him, when Antigonus his Deputy in that City, made her to stay, until his Matters further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolf by the Ears; he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her go. She would not be his Wife; he had none honest pretence to force her; and to keep her Prisoner, had been the way, by which he might have incurred a general hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the comic taken by Callander against Roxane (a Lady less respected than Alexander's own Sister) did well testify. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commodity of so fair a Title to the Kingdom, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governour of Sardis, willing him in any case to do it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certain Women afterwards were put to death, as mischievous conspirers against the life of that good Lady. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his own opinion: but the World was less foolish, than to be so deluded. How the Murder was detected, we need not ask; for seldom is that bloody crime unrevealed; and never so ill smothered, as when great Persons are the Authors.

This was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought upon nothing less than the execution of Gods Justice, due unto the cruelty of these powerful, but merciless Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, upon so wicked foundations of innocent Blood, were soon after cast down, over-whelming themselves or their Children with the Ruins, as the sequel will declare.

§. X.

How Demetrius, the Son of Antigonus, gave liberty to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of Callander out of those parts. The immoderate Honours decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

None being left alive, that had any Title to the Kingdom; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superiour, should freely profess themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill befitted the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbear it: neither seemed it convenient in the judgment of Antigonus, to crown his last action with such a Title, as if he had attained unto greatness by that foul Murder, the infamy whereof he was careful how to discharge from his own Head. He purposed therefore to undertake a plausible enterprise, even the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such Honour as would not only drown all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of Royalty; whereof in seeming modesty, he was not covetous. To this purpose, he delivered a strong Army, with a Navy of two hundred and fifty Sail, and five thousand Talents Talents of Silver, unto Demetrius his Son; willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceed, in setting all the Country free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected; so that without resistance he entered the Haven, it being thought that a Fleet of Proton, Callander's good Friend, had been arrived. But when it was known, both who he was, and what was the cause of his coming, the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalerus forsook the Town, and withdrew himself to Thebes, under safe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia strove to make good that piece, which after a while was won upon them by force. During the Siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Callander, and so reformed the City to liberty.

I think it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents as may seem no better than meer trifles, for even by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly train themselves to the observance of general commended Rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their own Natures. The Lady Cratippa lay in Patras, and had a great desire to see Demetrius; hoping, belike, that he might by his means better her Estate, and recover her Towns of Syrac and Corinth, detained by Proton (to whose Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered Money for the surrender of them) yet the only business pretended was Love. He being advertised hereof, left his Forces in the Country of Megara, and taking a Company of his lightest armed, for guard of his Person, made a long journey to meet with her. This Troop also he caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might see her when she came. As closely as the business was carried, some of his Enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any terms of reason, by taking his dear Son Prisoner. Their project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly upon him, that he had no better shift than to muffle himself in an old Cloak, and creep away disguised, leaving them to ransack his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medley of Conditions; especially an extreme diffidulness in wanton Pleasures, and a painful industry in matter of War. He was of a most amiable Countenance, a gentle Nature, and a good Wit; excellent in devising Engines of War, and curious in working them with his own Hands. He knew better how to reform his bad Fortune, than how to rule his good. For Adversity made his Valour more active, Prosperity stupified him with an over-weening, wherein he thought that he might do what he listed. His Fortune was as changeable, as were his Qualities: turning often round, like the Picture of her Wheel, till she had wound up the Thread of his Life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Camp, and finishing his business at Megara; he returned, no longer to attend the issue of a Siege, to assail Munychia by force, that so he might accomplish the Liberty of Athens; which, until it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the City. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the Assault, the Multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the Walls, prevailed upon the resolution of those that lay within it, and won the place in two days. The Walls and all the Defences of that Piece against the City, were levelled with the Ground; and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom will it was given their Liberty, with promise to aid them in maintaining it.

The Fame of this Action was louder than of any other Victory gotten by Demetrius with greater Skill and Industry. For the Athenians having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their Tongues: conversing to safe Flattery that Eloquence of theirs, which the Virtues of their Ancestors had suited unto more many Arguments.

They decreed unto Antigonus and Demetrius the Name of Kings; they consecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entered their City, and built there an Altar, calling it by the Name of Demetrius the saviour; they called them by the Names of the Gods their Saviours, ordaining that every year there should be chosen a Priest of these Gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the Gods; like as were they, whom they sent unto the Oracle of Jupiter or Apollo.

It were a frivolous diligence to rehearse all their Flatteries, these being so gross. Hereby they not only corrupted the young Prince, but made that Acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no use. For he could not handily take upon him the Name of King, as imposed by the Athenians, unless he would seem to approve their Vanity, in loading him with more than humane Honours. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori, or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieve them with Corn, and Timber to build Ships, he gave them almost a hundred thousand quarters of Wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle, or rather, so weak is great Power in resisting the Assaults of Flattery.

§. XI.

The great Victory of Demetrius against Proton in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius took upon them the Style of Kings; wherein others followed their Example.

From this glorious Work, Antigonus called away Demetrius unto a business of greater difficulty: meaning to employ his service against Proton in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willing to establish a general Council, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Country. About the same time Antigonus withdrew his own Garrison out of Imbros, committing their Liberty entire into the Peoples hands: whereby it might appear, that as he would not permit any other to oppress the Greeks, so would he be far from doing it himself. This was enough to hold his Reputation high among these new purchased Friends: it followed, that he should convert his Forces to the winning of ground upon his Enemies.

A pitiful Tragedy had lately happened in Cyprus, through the inconsideration of Aeneas, Proton's Brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicoles, King of Paphos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so far that he thought himself past excuse; by which confidence, he was perhaps, the more easily deterred. To cut off this Negotiation and the false-hearted King of Paphos at one Blow, Menelaus was sent thither, who surrounding Nicoles his House with Soldiers, required in Ptolemies Name, to have him yielded to the Death. Nicoles offered to clear himself; but Menelaus told him, that die he must, and bid him come forth quietly. This desperate necessity caused the unhappy King to rid himself of Life: and his Death struck such an impression into his Wife, that she not only flew her self, but perfwaded the Wives of her Husbands Brethren to do the like. Also those Brethren of Nicoles, unto whom Ptolemy had intended no ill, being amazed with the suddenness of this Calamity, did shut up the Palace, and fettering it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Wherefore the Crime objected was, Nicoles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his Answer. Of this false Accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame for his rigorous proceeding: yet is it to be thought that much dislike fell also upon Ptolemy: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection, even upon those that gave the farthest removed occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a Power sufficient against any Opposition that Ptolemy was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him: either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves have the Rule of their own Country. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driven to save himself within the Walls of Salamis; where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong Succour, he had no likelihood to make good the Place, much less to retain Possession of the whole Island. His greatest help at the present, was the Fidelity of his Soldiers; whom no Rewards could win from him, nor good Usage (when any of them were taken Prisoners, and inrolled in the Enemies Bands) keep from returning to him, with this first opportunity. Most of them were Mercenaries; but all their Goods were in Ægypt, which was enough to keep them faithful. Yet could not this their Resolution have stood long against the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of Battery, if Ptolemy had not halted to the Rescue.

Ptolemy brought with him a hundred and forty Gallies, besides two hundred Ships of burden, for transporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible show, when it was descried afar; though more than half of it, was unfit for service in Fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the Opinion of his Forces the more dreadful, Ptolemy sent unto Demetrius a threatening Message, willing him to be gone, unless he would be overwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a Throng. But this young Gallant repaid him with Words of as much bravery, promising to let him escape, upon condition that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Siegon and Corimb.

Demetrius had no more than one hundred and eighteen Gallies; but they were for the most part, greater than those of Ptolemy; better stored with Weapons fit for that Service; and very well furnished with Engines in the Prowes to beat upon the Enemy. Nevertheless he stood in great doubt of threecore Gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, left Menelaus with them should set upon his Back: in which case, it was likely that should go very ill with him. Against this mischief, he bestowed ten of his own Gallies in the Mouth of that Haven, to keep Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his Horse-men on the Shore, to give what assistance they could, he, with the rest of his Fleet, puts to Sea against Ptolemy.

The Fight began early in the morning, and continued long with doubtful success. The Generals were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left Wing of his own Fleet. Each of them prevailed against the Squadron wherewith he encountered; but the success of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his Victory in one part was such as caused others to fall out of order, and finally drove all to betake themselves unto speedy flight. As for Ptolemy, he was fain to leave his advantage upon the Enemy in one part of the Fight, that he might relieve and animate those of his own which needed him in another. Wherein he found his Loss over great, to be repaired, by contending any longer against the Fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to save himself, in hope of better event, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this Battle no unusual accident; yet was the Victory greater than could have been expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-services, which the Greeks and Phenicians, that were with Demetrius, had, above those which followed Ptolemy: partly the good Furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no less, than in the Quality of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reasonably judge, that the two hundred Ships of Burthen, carrying the strength of Ptolemies Army, did not more encourage his own men and terrify his Enemies the day before the Fight; than bried in each part the contrary Affections, when in the beginning of the Fight, they fell off, and stood aloof. For though it were fitting that they should do so, yet a Multitude prepossessed with vain Conceits, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions, to think themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus issuing with his Fleet out of Salamis, should charge the Enemies in Stern, was utterly frustrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten Ships appointed to bear up the Mouth of the Haven: which they manfully performed, as great necessity required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the Courage of Men in Fight; especially of the Assailants: whereas on the contrary, they that find some part of their Fears vain, do easily gather hopeful Spirits, and conceive an Opinion of their own Ability, to do more than they had thought upon, out of their not suffering the harm that they had imagined.

Whoever the causes of this Victory were, the Fruit was very great. For Ptolemy had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his Fleet was either taken or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strive against the violence of Fortune; but yielded up all that he held in Cyprus, together with his Army, consisting of twelve thousand Foot, and a thousand and two hundred Horse, and those Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The same dejection of Spirit was found in the common Soldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had served the Ægyptians by Land: none of them repaying any more confidence in Ptolemy; but willingly becoming ing Followers of a new Lord, whose Army they now increased.

It was generally believed, that much more depended on the event of this Fight, than the Isle of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonos, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with Cares, thinking every day a year, till he were advertised of the Issue. In this mood Antigonos found him, a notable Flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Message of these good News. Antigonos had bethought himself of a Trick, whereby to double the Welcome of his joyful Errand: he caused his Ships to ride at Anchor a good distance from the Shore; he himself landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the Ship, and so all alone, he went forward, looking very sadly, that no part of his Tidings might appear in his Countenance. Report of his Arrival (for it was known where he had been) came presently to Antigonos, who sent Messenger after Messenger to meet him on the way, and bring speedy word how all went. But neither any Answer, nor so much of a Look, as might intimate the purport of his Errand, could be won from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he fair and softly forward, with a great Throng at his Heels (that ferved well to set out his Pageant) until he came in sight of Antigonos; who could not contain himself, but went down to meet him at the Gare, and hear the News. Then did Antigonos, upon the suddain, with a high Voice, salute Antigonos by the Name of King; uttering the greatness of the Victory (with as much Pomp as before he had covered it with Silence) in the hearing of all the People; who with loud Acclamations, gave that Name of King both to Antigonos and to his Son Demetrius. Antigonos, in requital of the long Sufpence, wherein Antigonos had held him, said that it should also be long ere he received his Reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diadem, which his Friends did set on his Head, he could not with a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his Son.

When it was once noised abroad that Antigonos and Demetrius called themselves Kings; it was not long ere their Fellows were ready to follow the good Example. Ptolemy his Friends would by no means endure that their Lord should be thought a man dejected for the loss of a Fleet; therefore they saluted him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace, had boldness enough to put the Diadem about his own Head. Selenus had, before this time, among the barbarous People, taken upon him as King; but now he used the title indifferently, as well among the Greeks and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himself contented with his own Name: whereby howsoever he might shadow his Pride, he no way lessened the Fame of his Cruelty against his Masters House. But the Name which he forbore, his Sons after him, were bold to usurp, though with ill success, as will appear, when they shall enter upon the Stage; whereon these old Tragedians, under new Habits, as no longer now the same Persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger Looks, and more boistrous Actions, not with greater Grace and Judgment than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Wars between the Kings of Ægypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others, until all Alexanders Princes were consumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of Antigonos against Ægypt, with ill success.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that Name upon them, in imitation of Antigonos himself, as befitting his Greatness; which was such as gave him hope to swallow them up, together with their new Titles. Being not ignorant of his own strength, he resolved to single out Ptolemy, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose he prepared an Army of eighteen thousand Foot, and eight thousand Horse, with fourscore and three Elephants: as likewise a Fleet of a hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred Ships of Burden. The Land-forces he commanded in Person: of the Navy, Demetrius was Admiral.

When all was ready for the Journey, the Seamen advised him to stay yet eight days longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his hasty desire to prevent all preparations for resistance that Ptolemy should make, rejected this Counsel, imputing it rather to their Fear than Skill. Wherefore he departed from Antigonos (a Town which he had built in Cyria, and called af his own Name, that was soon changed into Selenia, by his mortal Enemy) and came to Gaza; where he met with his Fleet. The nearer that he drew to Ægypt, the more haste he made: thinking by celerity to prevail more than by his great Power. He caused his Soldiers to carry ready Provision of Victuals, and had many Camels laden with all necessaries for passing the Deserts, over which he marched with no small toil, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Callis, which is near adjoining to Nilus, he saw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not far from the Shore, in ill case, and many Ships wanting. It had been forely beaten with foul weather, wherein some were lost, others driven back to Gaza, or scattered elsewhere into such Creeks as they could recover: Demetrius himself, with the best and strongest Vessels, did so long beat it up against the Wind, that all his fresh Water was spent; in which extremity, he and all his miff had perished, had not the Tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these over-wearied, thirsty, and Sea-beaten Souldiers received relief; after these painful Travels there followed a War, no less painful than to little purpose, for Ptolemy had so fortified all the Passages upon the River of Nilus, as he assured himself either to end the War there, or if his Guards should happen to be forc'd, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakening of the Assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Army (which he held entire) entertain the Invader upon advantage enough. All that Antigonus fought, was to come to Blows speedily, Ptolemy on the contrary to beat Antigonus by the Belly. It is true that Nilus gave him Water enough, but Wood he had none to warm it, and while Antigonus assaulted the Rampiers raised upon the River in vain, Ptolemy assid the Faith of his Souldiers with good success for with great Gifts, and greater Promises, he carried them over so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments upon the Passages next the Enemy, and in the mean while taken a resolution to return, Ptolemy had turned him out of Aegypt ill attended.

Some of them indeed he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extrem Torments, but in all likelihood with the same ill success that Perdicus had formerly done when he invaded Aegypt, had he not readily removed his Army further off from the noise of their Entertainment that had already been won from him. To prevent therefore, as well the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forc'd Retreat, he secretly practis'd the advice of his Council, upon whom the burden must be laid of his entrance, and leaving Aegypt.

It is indeed less prejudicial in such like cases, that Errors, Dishonours, and Losses, be laid on Counsellors and Captains, than on Kings, on the Directed than on the Director, for the Honour and Reputation of a Prince is far more precious than that of a Vassal; Charles the Fifth, as many other Princes have done, laid the Loss and Dishonour he received in the Invasion of France, by the way of Provence, to Antoine de Lema, whether justly or no, I know not; but howsoever all the Historians of that time agree, that the Sorrow thereof cost that brave Captain his Life. Certainly to give any violent advice in doubtful Enterprises, is rather a Testimony of Love, than of Wisdom in the giver; for the ill success is always cast upon the Council, the good never wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have some time known it, that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, have not only been dissuaded, but held in a kind by strong hand, from hazarding their own Persons, and yet have those kind of Mutinies never been called to a Marshalls Court.

§. II.

How the City of Rhodes was besieged by Demetrius.

His departure of Antigonus left behind it many dead Carcasses, and a great deal of Joy in Aegypt. Ptolemy held a solemn Feast, and sent Messengers abroad, laden with glad News, to Seleucus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side with the report of this late Felicity, though it appeared but in a defensive War. Antigonus on the contrary flattered himself with another interpretation, calling the Joys of his Enemies for Witnesses of his own Greatness, seeing they arose but from so little things: his Enemies being but bare Savers by the last Bargain, and himself, as he supposed, having lost but a little time, and no part of his Honour in the late Retreat. Howsoever it were, yet he meant to follow his Affairs henceforth in a another fashion, for that which he could not cleave asunder by great blows, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the Branches first, to fell the Tree itself with the more facility. To effect which he resolv'd (leaving the great ones to grow a while) to root up the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the forenamed Confederates should be forc'd, either to relieve, or to lose; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the Field, where the advantage of Power, and of all other Warlike Provisions, promised him Victory.

At this time the City of Rhodes was very mighty, being well governed, and having long held it self in good Neutrality, it drew the better part of all the Trade of those parts, and thereby a great deal of Riches to it self, to maintain which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed Ships, by which, it not only beat off all Pirates and petty Thieves, but the Reputation of their Strength was thereby so much increased, as all the Neighbour Princes fought their Alliance and Confederacy.

In this dangerous time (in which they must either refuse all that fought them, and so stand friendless and apart, or joyn themselves to some one; and thereby forgoe the Peace, by which their Greatness had grown) their Affections carried them to the Aegyptians, both because the greatest part of their Trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his Disposition, Greatness, and Neighbourhood was fearful unto them. This Affection of theirs, with some other Passages more apparent, gave argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himself against them by petty Injuries, of taking some of their Ships, with such other Grievances, while he made a more weighty preparation to pursue the War against them openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatness of the Enterprise, he employed his Son Demetrius against them in their own Island, who brought such terror upon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of Friendship and Honour, they offered him their assistance and service against whomsoever. Demetrius, who knew from whence this Charge came, and that the alteration was perfwaded by fear, and not by Love, raised his Demands to an intolerable height, requiring an hundred Hostages to be delivered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many Ships of War as himself pleas'd: these Conditions, more properly to be imposed upon a Scare already conquered, than on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a contraind assistance, assistance, reftored unto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolve to defend their Liberty to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able Bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow Citizens, than to make themselves fellow Slaves with them.

Demetrius having refused the fair conditions offered, and the Rhodians the fearful ones propounded them, makes preparation for a long Siege, and finding no appearance to carry the Place in fury, he set in hand with his Engines of Battery; in the invention and use of which, he never thought himself a greater Artist, than in this War. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the Assaults given them for a whole year, after many brave Sallies out of the Town, and the Famine which they endured within the Town, which had proved far more extreme, if Ptolemy had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Græcian Embassadors, gave over the Siege; a hundred Hostages they gave him for performance of the Peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the City.

Hæreunto Demetrius was brought by the usual Policy of War and State: for while, with the Flower of all his Fathers Forces, he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the War as in former times, by Practice and Surprise, but by a strong and well compounded Army, which he himself led as far as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and endangered Athens it self. On the other side (though with less success) did Polyperchon invade Poloponnesus. These dangerous undertakings upon Greece, advised the Athenians and Ætolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and advised Demetrius rather to abandon the Enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great Honour which he had formerly gotten, by setting all Greece at liberty.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Island, than that the Rhodians erected Statues in Honour of Lysimachus and Cassander, but for Ptolemy, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most relief, they consulted the Oracle of Jupiter, whether it were not lawful to call him a God. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hæmon, gave the same fair answer for Ptolemy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Master; for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Army at his heels, so was Ptolemy at this time Lord of the Soil: and yet was this a far more cleanly Creation than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius by Decree of the People. A mad Age it was, when so many of Alexander's Captains could not content themselves with the Stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called Gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece, Cassander desires Peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtain it. Great Preparations of War against Antigonus.

Demetrius coming with a strong Fleet and Army into Greece, quickly drove Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his Fortune, chased him beyond the Straits of Thermopyla. Herein his Reputation did much avail him, which was so great, that six thousand of his Enemies Souldiers revolted unto him. So partly by the greatness of his Name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those Straights, and giving liberty unto the People, he bestowed upon the Athenians those Peeces which had been fortified against them, to block them up. Then went he into Poloponnesus, where he found the like, or more easy success: for he suddenly took Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Country, bestowing liberty upon such as needed it. The Town of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old Seat into an other place: and called it after his own Name Demetrius. This done, he betook himself to his Pleasure: At the Isthmian Games he caused himself to be proclaimed Captain General of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of Jest, that any, save himself or his Father, should usurp the Name of King. But in his Behaviour, he was so far unlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, he deserved none other Name than of a drunken Pollard. Yet were the Athenians as ready as ever to devise new Honours for him; among which they made one Decree, that whatsoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the Gods, and just with Men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great fear, lest the Wars should fall heavily upon him in Macedon, which to avoid, he knew no better way than to make Peace with his Enemy betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embassadors, but had no better answer from Antigonus, than that he should submit his whole Estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him look about him, and labour hard in soliciting his Friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselves; neither found he them slow in apprehending the common Danger, for Lysimachus knew, that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolemy and Seleucus ignorant of that which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himself in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joyn't Forces they should all together set upon the common Enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice, but scorned all their preparations, saying, That he would as easily scatter them, as a Flock of Birds are driven away with a Stone. With these concepts he pleased himself, and no way hindred the proceeding of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Town of Antigonia (a Name that it must shortly loose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately Game and Pageants, in ostentation of his Glory. But thither was brought unto him the tumultuous News of Lysimachus his Victories about Hælespont. For Cassander had committed unto Lysimachus part of his Forces, wherewith to pass over into Asia, while himself with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hælespont, began to make hot War upon the Subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts to joyn with him by fair means; winning others by force, and wasting the Country round about.

To repress this unexpected boldness, Antigonus made hasty Journeys, and came soon enough to recover his Losses, but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus home, or compel him to come to Barrel.

Lysimachus waited for the coming of Seleucus; keeping himself the whilst from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was far off; and Seleucus his Preparations were too great to be soon in a readiness. The Winter also did hinder his Journey: which informed them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the Quarrel in open Field, held all those Nations in a great suspense, and bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus been so forward, that he refused to yield unto any peaceable Conditions. At length Seleucus drew near with a mighty Army of his own (for he had gathered strength in that long time of leisure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great Aid from Ptolemy, that was joined with his Forces.

To help in this needful case, Demetrius was called over into Asia by his Fathers Letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made Peace with Cassander, upon reasonable terms: so the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Army for defence of the Country; and that his Journey might be without any such blemish of Reputation, as if he had abandoned his Dependents: for one Article of the Peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at liberty. Cassander was glad to be so rid of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this League have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise than they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, every one found means to clear himself of all Incumbrances elsewhere, to the end that each might freely apply himself to the tryal of the main Controversie in Asia.

§. IV.

How Antigonus was slain in a great Battel at Ipfus, near unto Ephesus; wherein his whole Estate was lost.

Seleucus, with his Son Antiochus, joyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Army, which was (all considered) not inferior to that of the Enemy. In greatness of Name (that helpeth much in all Wars, but especially in the Civil) they were rather unanswerable, than equal to their Adversaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them under with a mastering spirit, and had been reputed a King indeed, when the rest were held but Usurpers of the Title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, having given proof of his worth in many great Services of all kinds, and enriched the Art of War with many inventions, which even his Enemies, and particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, and fearfully flollen away from him to save his life; with young Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this Journey; and Lysimachus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his own from the wild Thracians; wanted much in Reputation, of that which was yielded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captains under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough, to receive any benefit that Fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardy and well exercised: many of them having served under Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twenty years had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their Affections; the Followers of Seleucus were easily perverted; that in this Battel they must either get the upper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged unto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could discern no other necessity of fighting, than the obtinate quality of their Lord, that needs would be Master of all. Antigonus had about threethree and ten thousand Foot, ten thousand Horse, and threethree and fifteen Elephants. His Enemies were six thousand short of him in number of their Foot; in Horse they had the odds of five hundred; of Elephants they had four hundred, and a hundred and twenty armed Chariots of War; which Helps, though they little had availed the Perfians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captain.

Antigonus himself, either troubled with the unexpected greatness of his Enemies Forces, or preferring little good like to ensue, grew very pensive, communing much in private with his Son, whom he commended to the Army as his Successor: whereas in former times he had never been so joyous, as towards the hour of Battel, nor had been accustomed to make his Son, or any other, privy to his counsel, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad luck, either foregoing the Fight, or afterwards devised, I hold it needless to recount: Diana of Ephesus dwelt near to the place of Battel, a buxie Goddess in many great Fights, and therefore likely to have been thrust into the Fable, if any matter, nearly resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to believe that these two so gallant Armies, containing well near all the strength of Alexander's whole Empire, performed a notable Fight, being led by such worthy Commanders and whom the issue thereof did highly concern. Yet are few of the Particulars recorded: an easie loss in regard of the much variety, wherewith every Story aboundeth in this kind. The most memorable things in the Battel, were these. Demetrius with his best force of Horse, charged valiantly, upon young Antiochus; whom when he had broken, and put to flight, he was so transported with the heat of his good success, that he never gave over his pursuit, but left his Father naked, and left thereby both him, and the Victory. For when Seleucus perceived this advantage, he interposed his Elephants, between Demetrius and the Palians of Antigonus: and with many Troops of Horse offering to break upon the Enemies Battel, whereforever it lay most open, he did so terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather chose to revolt from their Lord, whilst they were fairly invited, than to sustain the fury of so dangerous an impression. This Cowardize, or rather Treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into flight; exposing their General to the last end of his Destinies. Antigonus was then fourscore years old, very far and unwieldy, so that he was unfit for fight, if his high spirit could have entertained any thought thereof. He had about him some of his most trusty Followers, and as many others as he could hold together. When one that perceived a great Troop making towards his Person, told him, Sir King, your Company means to charge you; he answered, Will any then, for who defends me? but anon Demetrius will relieve us. Thus expecting, to the very last, that his Son should come to the rescue, he received so many Darts into his Body, as took away his lately ambitious, but then fearful Hopes, together with his troublesome Life.

His great ability in matter of Arms, together with his insatiable desire of Empire, have sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his Actions. He was more feared by his Enemies, than loved by his Friends; as one that could not moderate his Fortune, but used Violence towards all alike, as if it had been some Verue nearest representing a Kingly Majesty. This was the cause that so many of his Followers revolted to his Enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Army forsook him in his last necessity. For those Kings and Princes that call all the careful endeavors of their Vassals, only Duty and Debt; and are more apt to punish the least Offences, than to reward the greatest Services: shall find themselves upon the first change of Fortune, (seeing it is Love only that stays by Adversity) not only the most friendless, but even the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he lived; in part he left it to be verified upon his Son.

§. V.

How Demetrius forsaken by the Athenians after his Overthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolemy, beginning a new Fortune, and shortly entering into new Quarrels.

For Demetrius, at his return, from the idle pursuit of young Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to save himself, with four thousand Horse, and five thousand Foot, by a speedy retreat unto Ephesus, whence he made great haste towards Athens, as to the Place, that for his sake would suffer any Extremity. But whilst he was in the midst of his course thither, the Athenian Ambassadors met him with a Decree of the People, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their City. These were Ambassadors, not Theoroi, or Consultors with the Oracle. It was a shameful Ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his misery, with such a Decree: neither did any part of his Calamity more afflict the unfortunate Prince, than to see his Adversity despised by those whom he had thought his surest Friends. Yet was he fain to give good words. For he had left many of his Ships in their Haven, of which he now stood in great need, and therefore was fain to speak them fair, that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall live to teach them their old Language, and speak unto them in another Time. When he had gotten to his Ships, he failed to the Islands, where he found nothing but manner of discomfort. His Garrisons were every where broken up; the Souldiers having taken themselves to his Enemies Pay. So that he was King only of a small Army and Fleet, without money or means, wherewith to sustain him and his Followers, any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part, of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerors, and those few Places which as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieve. For to put himself into the Field, on the side of Asia, he had no power; and to include himself in any Town, how strong soever, were but to imprison his Fortune, and his Hopes, or therein indeed to bury himself and his Estate. He therefore creeping thorough those Bushes, that had fewest Briars, fell upon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdom, whereof he gave all the spoil, that was gotten, to his Souldiers: his own losses having been too great, to be repayed again by small Prizes. In the mean while, the Confederate Princes had wherewithal to buse themselves, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late Victory had made them Lords: wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage, by being present and Master of the Field. For neither Ptolemy, nor Cassander, were at the Overthrow given, having only sent certain Troops to re-inforce the Army which Seleucus led: who took hold of a part of Asia the less, and all Syria, being no otherwise divided from his own Territory than by the River of Euphrates. For there had not any order been taken by the Confederates, for the division of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that War, which they made only in their own common defence. It was therefore lawful for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the Victory: as which, nevertheless others did repine, and though they neither could, nor durst, accuse him of ill dealing, for the present, yet seeing the over-greatness of Seleucus brought no less danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted upon the same Reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined: for he read it in the Law universal of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forgot Friendship on all sides, and cure themselves of all unprofitable Passion: the hatred of each to other, and their Loves being laid on the one side, against their Profits on the other were found to far too light, as Seleucus who had to day slain Antigonus the Father, and driven Demetrius the Son out of Asia, sought to morrow, how to match himself with Stratonice, Demetrius his Daughter, and so by Demetrius to serve his turn against Lysimachus.

The story of this Stratonice, with whom young Antiochus, the Son of Seleucus, fell so passionately in love, and so distempered, as Seleucus his Father, to save his Sons life, gave her (though she were his Wife) unto him, and how his passion was discovered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this Alliance between Seleucus and Demetrius; between Ptolemy and Lysimachus; between Demetrius and Cassander; between Demetrius and Ptolemy; though for the present it brought one of them again into the rank of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the Marriages between Christian Kings have done in latter Times: namely between the Austrians, the Aragomians, the French, and other Princes; neither have the Leagues of those older Times been found more faithful, than those of the same later Times have been; as in the Stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperor, of Francis the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Milan, and others, the Reader may observe: between whom from the year of our Lord, One thousand, four hundred, ninety, and five, when Charles the eighth undertook the Conquest of Naples, to the year, One thousand, five hundred, fifty, and eight, when Henry the second died, the Histories of those Times tell us, that all the Bonds, either by the Bed or by the Book, either by Weddings, or Sacramental Oaths, had neither faithful purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap this profit, by giving his Daughter to his Enemy Seleucus; that he recovered Cilicia from Plisarchus, the Brother of Cassander; who had gotten it as his share in the division of Antigonus his Possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to hold it by his proper Forces, from him, that entered upon it as a lawful Heir: neither would Seleucus lend him any Help, as by the Rule of Confederacy he should have done, against the common Enemy. So Philarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Selenus as Demetrius, went unto Cassander; whither Phila, their Sister, followed him thither, to pacify them both, and keep all quiet; being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her Husband, that was not strong enough to deal with Cassander, and therefore glad to make use of that bond of Alliance betwixt them, whereof in his own prosperity, he never took notice to the others good. About the same time he took to Wife a Daughter of Prology (plurality of Wives being familiar with these Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eastern Conquests) and so was he by two Marriages, rather freed from two Enemies, than strengthened with two Friends: for neither of them withheld him any good, otherwise than might serve to advance their own ambitious desires.

Selenus and Prology, could both of them have been contented better, that Demetrius, with help of their Countenance, should seek his Fortune somewhat farther off, than settle his Estate under their Noses. Particularly Selenus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himself; and Prology had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Isle of Cyprus. Now whether it were so that Selenus would fain have for his new Father-in-law upon the neck of Lyfmacus; or whether he were indeed greedy of the bargain, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late Purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keep as much Land as he could, having already found in Cilicia twelve thousand Talents of his Fathers Treasure, that should serve him to make sport a while. This refusal to displeased Selenus, that in angry terms he demanded the City of Tyre and Sidon, to be surrendered unto him; which were the only Places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great Bartel. Instead of giving them up, Demetrius took present order to have them better manned; and spake it stoutly, that were he overcome a thousand times, yet would he not hire Selenus to become his Son-in-law. In this Quarrel Selenus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would break Friendship with his Father-in-law for two Towns, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to govern. But the fire consumed it self in words, which had it fastned upon arms, like it is that the weaker should have found Friends, out of envy to the stronger.

S. VI.

How Demetrius won the City of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of Troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

IN the mean while, the Athenians not knowing how to use the liberty, which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by Sedition, under the Tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their disaffected City was so weakened, that it seemed ill able to keep off the punishment due to their late Ingratitude. This advantage fastned him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to prevent himself unto them, in the habit of a revenging Fury. He brought against them all the Force that he could well spare from other Employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtful Eastern Friends, were unwilling to give impediment to any Business that might entangle him in Greece. His first Enterprise in Athens had ill success; a great part of his Fleet perishing in a Tempest. But he soon repaired the loss; and (after some Victories in Peloponnesus, where he won divers Towns that had fallen from him) returning to the Enterprise, wasted the Country of Attica, and cut off all Relief from the City, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it, any long time: for it stood in a barren Soil, and wanted now the command of those Islands, and Places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with Victuals; being all destitute of means to keep such a Navy, as might bring in supply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of Succour from Prology, who (trusting thereby to win the Love of Greece) had laden a hundred and fifty Ships with Corn, and sent them to relieve the hungry City. But these hundred and fifty were unable to deal with three hundred good fighting Ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore halted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come so near, that they might be defrayed. This brake the heart of the People; among whom the Famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Mouse, which dropped down between them from the House top. Wherefore they sent Ambassadors to yield up the Town, and crave pardon, having so far offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capital offence, to propose any motion of Peace. Yet were they fain to abolish this Decree: rather because they knew not what else to do, than because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the Victory, did not only forbear to take away the Lives of these unthankful men; which they had submitted unto his mercy; but out of his liberality gave them food, and placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the People. Nevertheless he was grown wiser than to trust them so far as he had done in Times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering Acclamations) they bade him take their Havens, and dispole of them at his pleasure; he was ready to lay hold upon the word, and leave a fire Garrison within their Walls, to keep them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedaemonians in two Battels, and was in very fair possibility to take their City: when the dangerous news called him in all haste, of Lyfmacus and Prology, that prevailed faster upon him elsewhere, than himself did upon his Enemies in Greece. Lyfmacus had won many Towns in Asia; Prology had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were faithfully besieged. Whilst he was bethinking himself which way to turn his Forces, a notable piece of business offered it self, which thrust all other Cares out of his Head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soon after him, Philip his eldest Son, whole two younger Brethren, Antipater and Alexander, fought for the Kingdom. In this Quarrel, Theffalonia the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, than to her elder Son: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his own Mother. The odiousness of this Fact gave a fair lustre to Alexander's Cause: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in revenge of the Queens death, upon that wicked Parricide Antipater. Anti-

Antipater was so strongly backed, by Lyfmacus, whose Daughter he had married, that Alexander could not hope to make his Party good without some foreign aid. For which cause he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will soon appear, in the following Tragedy, of him and his Brother. Their Father Cassander had been one that shifted well for himself, at such time as every man fought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered division of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Soldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withal more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely have made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his Head against a Wall, upon some opinion of Contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary Quarrel, derived from his Father, whom the could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by cruelty, that she used against his Friends, both alive and dead, as it made him adventure upon shedding the Royal Blood; wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care how far he proceeded in that course of Murder. His carefulness to destroy those Women and Children, whose Lives hindered his purpose, argues him to have been rather skillful in matters of Arms, than a valiant man: such cruelty being a true mark of cowardice, which fears afar off the dangers that may quietly pass away: and seeks to avoid them by base and wicked means, as never thinking it self safe enough, until there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Reuane it may be said, that they had well deserved the bloody end which overtook them; yet ill befitted it Cassander to do the office of a Hangman. But Alexander's Children had by no Law of men deserved to die for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his Bed, yet the divine Justice brought Swords upon his Wife and Children, that well revenged the cruelty of this bloody man, by destroying his whole House, as he had done his Masters.

Of Pyrrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassander's Children. Demetrius gets the Kingdom of Macedon; prevails in War against the Greeks; loses reputation in his War against Pyrrhus, and in his Civil Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrrhus and Lyfmacus invade him; his Army yields to Pyrrhus, who shares the Kingdom of Macedon with Lyfmacus.

Pyrrhus, the Son of that unfortunate Prince Scander, which perished in War against Cassander, was hardly preserved, being a sucking Infant, from the fury of his Fathers Enemies. When his Fosterers had conveyed him to Glaucias, King of Thyria, the deadly hatred of Cassander would have bought his Life with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heir. Glaucias was so far from betraying Pyrrhus, that he restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdom, when he was but twelve years of Age. Within the compass of six years, either the indifferences of his Youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, drove him out of his Kingdom, and left him to try the World anew. Then went he to Demetrius, (who married his Sister) became his Page; followed him a while in his Wars; was with him in the great Bartel of Issus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be Hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Prology. In Aegypt he so behaved himself, that he got the favour of Berenice, Prology's principal Wife; so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with Money and Men, unto Epirus; more beholding now to Prology, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdom of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that Business between the Children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassander's Sons, was so far too weak for Pyrrhus, that he had no desire to attend the coming of Demetrius, but made an hasty Agreement, and divided the Kingdom with his younger Brother Alexander; who likewise felt the Aid of Pyrrhus to trouble him, that he was more willing to fend him away, than to call in such another Helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacity to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Acroacia, Acarnania, and much more of the Country, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two Brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessity enforced the Brethren to Composition: but their Composition would not satisfy Demetrius, who took the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a Fool, to come so far with an Army, and find no work for it. This was a fivefold Complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to do as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wife course, to remove this over-diligent Friend, by murdering him upon some advantage. Thus Demetrius reported the Story, and it might be true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, believed it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himself was seized and slain by Demetrius; who took his part of the Kingdom, as a reward of the Murder; excusing the fact so well, by telling his own danger, and what a naughty man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lyfmacus was busied in War with a King of the wild Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seek Peace of Demetrius, which to obtain, he caused the remainder of Macedon to be given up; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his Son-in-law. At this ill Bargain Antipater grievously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed; until his Father-in-law, to save the labour of making many excuses, took away his troublesome Life. Thus in haste, with a kind of neglect, and as it were to avoid molestation, were slain the Children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slain his own Masters Children, in a wife course of policy, with careful meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his own House, that fell down upon his Grave, ere the Earth on it was thoroughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an access of Dominion, added much to the greatness of Demetrius. But indeed it shewed his Inimicity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of Civil Government: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the use and fruit of a Kingdom, to be none other, than to do what a King listed. He gave himself over to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those that offered to trouble him with Supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing Justice. He hath more skill in getting a Kingdom than in ruling it: War being his Recreation, and Luxury his Nature. By long rest (as six years Raign is long to him, that knows not how to raign one year) he discovered so much of his worst condition, as made both the People weary of his Idleness; and the Souldiers, of his Vaniry. He was freed from care of Matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost, though more especially, by hearing that Prology had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his Mother and Children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making War in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but used his Victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus he would have done somewhat (the Peace between them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this Journey purchased nothing but enmity. Another Expedition he took in hand against Pyrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon; which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdom; he had also made Excursions into Thessaly; but there needed not any handon presence of Quarrel, seeing Demetrius thought himself strong enough to over-run his Enemies Countrey, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they have known raw Novices as extraordinary. Pyrhus was a Captain, whom later Ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the rank of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexander's followers. At this time, he mist that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell upon the other half: which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good Conduct, than of his private Valour, shewed in single Combat against Pantiaichus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of Body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was utterly beaten. The loss of this Battle did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexander's Graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely Vestures: but (said they) none, save Pyrhus, is like him indeed, in performing the office of a Captain.

These Rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their own King; whom they began to dislike, not so much in regard of his unprofitable Journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Countrey, and brought home his Army in good case) as of his Infolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His Apparell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and now fangled, but very unmanly; and serving chiefly, to be a daily witness, how much he contemned them and their good opinion. Of his Souldiers lives he was reckless: and suffered unwisely this un-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of Justice; and (as it were, to publish unto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) having by a shew of Popularity invited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poor sufferers after him in great hope, till coming to a Bridge, he threw all their Writings into the River; pleasing himself, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almost won it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sick in his Bed: who recovering health, and taking the Field; had such great odds of strength, as made Pyrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to have some feeling of the general hate; which to redress, he did not (for he could not) alter his own conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on work in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appear: that is, in a great War. His intent was to invade Asia, with a Royal Army: wherein the fortune of one Battle might give him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made Peace with Pyrhus; that he might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Army, of almost a hundred thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse: with a Navy of five hundred Sails, wherein were many Ships, far exceeding the greatness of any that had been seen before; yet so swift and useful wital, that the greatness was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these Preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolemy suspect their own Forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrhus, to join against this ambitious Son of Antigonus; that was like to prove more dangerous to them all, than ever was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no security for his Friends in Europe; what League sooner were of old concluded. Therefore they resolved to begin with him betimes, and each to invade that Quarter of Macedon, that lay next his own Kingdom. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whilst he was yet on the way, news were brought into his Camp, that Pyrhus had won Berecha. The matter was not over-great: were it not, that minds prepared with little discontent, are ready to lay hold upon small occasions of dislike. All the Camp was in uproar: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to utter seditious words, and many desired leave of Demetrius, to go to their own Houses, meaning indeed to have gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wisest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their own Countreyman, against Pyrhus that was a stranger: hoping by Victory against the Epirots, to recover the love of his followers, in such sort that he might afterwards at leisure deal with the other. But herein his wisdom beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hasty as he, to meet with Pyrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spoke of his Valour; some enquired, others answered, of his Person, his Armour, and other tokens whereby he might be known; as particularly, by a pair of Goats Horns, that he wore on his Crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Divers of them stole away, and ran over into Pyrhus's his Camp: where the news that they brought, were better welcome, than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get sight of Pyrhus, they would all salute him King. To try this, Pyrhus rode forth, and presented himself bareheaded in view of the Camp, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The news of his arrival found a general applause, and every one began to look out, with desire to see eye on him. His Face was not so well known as his Helmet; there-therefore he was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their Service; neither were there any that spake for Demetrius: only some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and shift for himself. So Demetrius threw aside his Maskers Habit, and attiring himself poorly, did fearfully steal away out of his own Camp: deserving well this calamity, whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsel of his Friends, or whether, his behaviour deprived him of such Friends, as would dare to let him hear the unpleasant found of necessary truth.

Whilst Pyrhus was making this Triumphant Entry into the Kingdom of Macedon, Lysimachus came upon him very unseasonably, and would needs have half; saying, that he had done as much as Pyrhus in the War, and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gains. The bargain was quickly made, and the division agreed upon; each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to work his fellow quite out of all upon better opportunity.

S. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering Forces, enterprised many things with ill success, in Greece and Asia. How he was driven upon Seleucus, and compelled to yield himself. His Imprisonment and Death.

THE Athenians were as unthankful to Demetrius in this his Adversity, as they had been in former times. For they presently forsook his Friendship, and called Pyrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when he went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his Forces in Greece, under his Son Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soon gotten an Army; though Phila his Wife (who is highly commended for a wife and virtuous Lady) did Poison her self, upon desperate grief of his misfortune. The first upon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians, that had well deserved it. He began to lay Siege to their Town; but was pacified by Craley the Philosopher, whom they made their Spokesman; and taking fair words instead of satisfaction, passed over into Asia with eleven thousand Souldiers, meaning to try his Fortune against Lysimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first coming into those parts Fortune seemed to smile upon him. For many good Towns, willingly, or by compulsion, yielded to his obedience. There were also some Captains, that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their Companies and Treasures. But it was not long, ere Agathocles, the Son of Lysimachus, came upon him with an Army so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stock against it. Wherefore, he resolved to pass through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to find a Kingdom somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsel was grievously impeached by Agathocles; who pursued him close, and cut off all his Provisions, driving him to take which ways he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes, Demetrius vanquished this troublesome Enemy: nevertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poor titular King with extreme Famine. At length, in passing the River Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance; but were driven to travel with such speed, as might well be called a plain flight. So that with Famine, Pestilence, Diseases following Famine, and other accidents of War, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captain, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilst Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claim to the Country; but with vehement and humble Letters he besought his Son-in-law to call him to mind their Alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These Letters, at the first, wrought the well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himself, when he recovered strength after the Battle at Issus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Army.

Many Treaties were held between them; of which none took effect, through the jealousy of Seleucus. Therefore, meer desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man; and his fury got him some Victories, though of small importance. At length, sickness took and held him forty days, in which time, a great number of his few men ran to the Enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming been discovered by fugitives, that gave the Alarm. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him, with a few of his Friends, to shift for himself: he was compelled, by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsook him) to yield unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his own Humanity, by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts, and hindered him from admitting Demetrius to his presence; though otherwise he used him with as much favour, as any Prisoner could with. He was kept under free Guard in a Demi-Island, wherein were goodly Walks, Orchards, and Parks for Hunting. He had all that he asked Royally, and Friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his Liberty was reserved unto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonice, out of the High Countries. In this sort he spent three years, living merrily all the while (as one that now enjoyed the happiness, which with so much Travel and Blood-shed, he had fought in vain) and then died, leaving to his Son Antigonus, the same which his Father had left unto himself; his Friends and Hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his Qualities have appeared in his Actions, and the Fortune of his House will shew it self hereafter, in times and places convenient.

The death of Ptolemy, of Lysimachus, and of Seleucus, that was last of Alexander's Captains: with other occurrences.

ABOUT the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolemy King of Egypt; a virtuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountiful, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardful of his word. He had, by many Wives and Concubines, many Children: out of whom he selected Ptolemy Philadelphus, and caused him to reign together with himself, two or three years before he died, that so he might confirm him in the inheritance of the Kingdom. At this, Ptolemy Ceramus (for all of that House assumed the name of Prolem) was grievously afflicted: but no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving Entertainment. There were now only two of Alexander's Captains left: Seleucus and Lyfimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their Quarrel was, their near equality of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was, the Murders which Lyfimachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poisoning Agathocles his eldest Son; whose Wife and Children fled unto Seleucus for aid.

The Macedons, after seven Months pause, having spent their first heat of admiration, began to hearken to well to Lyfimachus, their natural Country-man, that they forsook Pyrrhus, upon none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had known well enough before; but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, what they lightly gave him. Lyfimachus had raised about five years alone, when the City of Lyfimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an Earthquake, appeared, by events, to have foretold the fall of his House. His own jealousy, and the indignation of a Mother-in-law, caused him to poison his Son Agathocles, which drew upon him that War, wherein (after the loss of all his fifteen Children, that were taken away by divers accidents) he perished himself.

Seleucus was encountered by Lyfimachus on Asia side, where one Battle concluded the War, with Lyfimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the Victory, that he was the last of all the great Heroes which had followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himself, as Lord and Heir of all the conquered World. So he passed over into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his days, and within seven Months followed Lyfimachus, and other of his fellows, by a bloody death; being treacherously slain by Prolem Ceramus, whole Friend and Patron he had been. Seventy and seven years old he was, when he fought with Lyfimachus, and Lyfimachus was seventy and four. With them ended the generation of old Captains, that had seen the days, as it were of another World under the Perfian: yet was there left one equal to any of them in the Art of War; even Pyrrhus the Epiror, of whom we spake before; that is now ready to enter into War with the Romans, a more Warlike People, than Alexander himself ever did encounter. Of which War, and of which People, it is needful that we here make mention, as of a story more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdoms, that were held by Alexander's Successors, with less (and still decreasing) virtue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome; and settling of the Eastern Kingdoms.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominion in Italy, from the death of Tullius Hostilius, unto such time as they were assailed by Pyrrhus.

HOW Rome was founded by Romulus, settled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small Victories, it gathered strength; unto such time as it became the Head of Latium, by the Conquest of Alba, in the Reign of Tullius Hostilius, it hath been already noted in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatness beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it self out of Italy, to overwhelm the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it convenient (as in like cases I have done) briefly to set down the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation of those many actions, which could not have been delivered in the Ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the History, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullius Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirty years, was burnt together with his House by Lightning) Anous

Martius, Grand-child to Numa Pompilius by his Daughter, and not much unlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the City about, enlarged it with the Hill Aventine, which he enclosed; built a Bridge over Tyber, and the City of Ofis upon the Sea, sixteen miles distant from Rome. Finally, having reigned four and twenty years, he died, and by his last Will he left his Children in charge with one Lucumon, the Son of Damaratus a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his Tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquini, by the name of which Town he was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that City in Hetruria coming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrences, together with his Wife Tarvaquil Prophecie, he grew a Favourite of Anous Martius; by his Gracian wit humouring the Factions of the Roman Court, in so much that after his decease, he became not only Protector to the Children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horse-men: neither was he less eminent in War than in Peace: for he prevailed often against the Tuicans, and from his Victories, the chiefest Ornaments of Triumph took their Original. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned eight and thirty years, he was slain by the Sons of Anous Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tarvaquil his Wife, perceiving what was done, informed the People from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sick, but not dangerously: And withal signified unto them, that in the interim of his sickness, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth she always Prophecie to be born to great hopes, (the Son of P. Corniculamus and Cerisia, a well defended, but Captive Woman) brought up in her House, and Husband unto her Daughter, should supply her Husbands place, in Governing the State, until his recovery: which Government, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards usurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and Valuations of the Peoples Wealth; among whom, at that time, fourcore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole Corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdom in as good sort, as if it had been a private Household. At length, having two Daughters of different natures, the one mild and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous: and finding also that the two Sons of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Aruns, which had been committed to his Tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his Daughters; he (willing to add Water, not Oyl, to Fire) gave the mild Daughter to Sextus, the hot-headed Son; and the violent, to Aruns, the gentle, in Marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it happened; the two mild ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joynd in Marriage: who soon concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claim to the Kingdom. Upon this Tumult, Servius Tullius hasting to the Senate, (where he thought by Authority to have bridled Infolency) was thrown down the stairs, and going home sore bruised, was slain by the way, when he had reigned forty and four years. Then Tullia his Daughter, first proclaiming her Husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to drive his Chariot over her Father's Corps; whereupon the Street had the denomination of Wicked-street. This Tarquine, exercising Cruelty without Justice, and Tyranny without Mercy, upon the People and Senators; having tired himself and them at home, used the same rage of Treachery upon his Borders. He took Ceriacum, Succia Pometia, and the Gabii. The illue of besieging Ardea, a Town eighteen miles distant from Rome, was of bad success. In the heat of which War, his Son Sextus Tarquinius violently ravished that chaste Lady Lueretia, his Kind-man Collatine's Wife: who in way of expiation for so unchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamy with her own Blood; so (having first bequeathed the revenge unto her Father Sp. Lueretius Tricipitinus, her Husband Collatine, and Junius Brutus) she killed her self: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his Wife and Children, was depopled and banished; and fled to Porfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the five and twentieth year of his Reign, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City; in which space Rome had scarce gotten full possession of fifteen miles round about her.

Junius Brutus, by the help of Collatine, having expelled Tarquinius, and freed his Country from that heavy yolk of Bondage, enforced the People by solemn Oath, never to admit any Government by Kings amongst them: whereupon they ranfacked their Kings Goods, confiscated their Fields to Mari, and conferred the Government of the State upon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their Ears, they changed the manner of their Government, from perpetual to annual, and from a single Governour to a double; left perpetual or sole Dominion might be some motive to Usurpation: and instead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers; that their Titles might remember them of their place, which was to be always mindful of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard feeling of troubled Waters, that the People, after this innovation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their own security, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to resign up his Authority, fearing that Tyranny would be Hereditary, and supposing that the very name and affinity with the House of Tarquinius, favoured already of their condition. In his room was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the Peoples Eyes, gave liberty, in matters of Controverfie, to appeal from the Consuls to the People: and that he might as well in Goods as in Person, avoid occasion of suspicion, caused his own House to be pulled down, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had been a Citadel. Neither was Brutus any ways deficient in matter of greater moment, which concerned as well the Peoples safety, as his favour: for having got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first rank his own Sons, were itching after innovations, hoping to restore the banished Kings; he caused them, publicly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all unparalelled to the block.

Hitherto the Romans, having by the unblemished integrity of Brutus, well appealed all inbred Quarrels at home, now hereafter employ their Military designments against Foreigners; first, for their Liberty; secondly, for enlarging of their Possessions; and lastly, for defending their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way between Latium and the Tuicans, having as yet but narrow bounds, being in her Minority, could not but give occasion of offence to her Neighbours; until by main opposition, having prevailed against her borderers, she used them as instruments, whereby to obtain the rest.

Their first War, in the first year of Consuls, was against Porfenna King of Hetruria; who being overpowered by Tarquinius's lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great Forces, to fear him again in his Kingdom.

In the first conflict, Horatius Cocles, having long time born the main brunt of his Enemies, on the Bridge over Tyber; at length, feeling himself too thin to stand against so many, caused the Bridge behind him to be broken down, and with his Armour, leaping into the River, like a hunted Stag, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned safe to his fellows, with the like resolution to sustain a new charge. Porfenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the Hill Janiculus, which is the very entrance unto the City, and found the Victory, in a manner, assuredly his own: yet admiring their Valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Mucius Scaevola (who having by error slain Porfenna his Secretary, instead of the King himself, did in scorn of torments threatened, burn off his own Hand) he thought it not any whit prejudicial, either to his safety, or credit, to enter League with them at the world hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleen was not quite abated, though Arvus his Son, and Brutus his Enemy, in single Combat, had slain each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the Field; and their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their Chastity, not for Beauty, mourned the loss of him one whole year. Into his place, for the residue of his year, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Father to Lucretia: and in his room (deceasing naturally before the year expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquinius, upon his overthrow, feeling the Fates diffract, thought it no boot to strive against the firebrand; and spent the residue of his time, which was about fourteen years, privately at Tusculum. Yet his Son-in-law, Mammius Tusculanum, stomaching asreth at those old repulses, because Porcena had made Peace with the Romans, and denied further succour, unto the Tarquines, mustered up the Latines, and gave Battel to the Romans at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue uncertain, until Aulus Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, purposely for this War, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Soldiers courage, threw their own Ensigns amidst the Enemy; and Collus, or Spurius Collus (Master of the Horse) an assistant Officer to the Dictator commanded to take off their Bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover again their Ensigns. This Fight was so well performed, that a report went current, of Castor and Polux; two Gods, who came on milk-white Steeds, to be Eye-witnesses of their Valour, and fellow helpers of their Victory; for the General consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their pains. After this, the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of Valour abroad, reflected upon themselves at home; and the sixteenth year after the Kings expulsion, upon infliction of some desperate bankrupts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an uproar in the Holy Mount; until by Mercennius Scaevola, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have some new Magistracies created, to whom they might appeal in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in their controversies, the Consuls Authority notwithstanding. This was enacted; and they were called the Tribunes of the People. After this atonement amongst themselves, they had continual War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other Neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volscians and Æquians held them longest; who made War, of themselves, upon the Romans; whereby they lost the best City in their whole Jurisdiction, Corioli.

In this Conquest, T. Manlius got the surname of Coriolanus: a name honourable then, as derived from a great Victory; although by reason of the poverty of the Town, a Roman General, in after times, would have been ashamed of that Title. But yet these graces had been no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, advised to sell Corn, which they procured from Sicily, at too high a rate, to the People: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalf, accused him, and after Judgment, banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volscians, whom lately before he had vanquished, incited them to renew their Forces again, which being committed unto him, and to Attius Tullius, he prevailed in Field so far forth, that he was come within four or five miles of the City. Encamping there, he made so sharp War, and was at such defiance with his Country, that he would not relent, by any supplications of Embassadors, until his Mother Veturia, and Volumnia his Wife, with a pitiful tune of Deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Country, than Friends to their Son and Husband, were more available to Rome, than was any force of Arms. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Army, was after put to death among the Volscians, as a Traytor, for neglecting such opportunity: or (as others surmise) living with them until old age, he died naturally.

Not long after this, the Veii in Hetruria provoked the Romans; against whom the Fabii, three hundred and six in number, all of one Family, engaged and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had been in a private Quarrel. These Fabii, after some good services, lying encamped at Cremora, were circumvented, and all slain; one only of that whole House, had been left, by reason of infancy, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In process of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volscians, at the Hill Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minucius their Consul, with his whole Army, had been discomfited, had not L. Quintus Cincinnatus, chosen Dictator, and taken from the Plough to the highest Honour in Rome, with success answerable to his Expedition, dispersed his Enemies, and freed his Country in the space of sixteen days. In the continuance of this Volscian War it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two years before chosen Governors of the State, and enactors of Solon's Laws amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the mean while the Consuls, and all other Magistracies) would have ravished Virginius, the Daughter of T. Virginus, Captain of a Company, and lying then in Camp at Algidum. Hereupon the People, in an uproar, took the Hill Acventum, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to resign up their Authority again to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or desire to revenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new War against the Veientes, and their adherents, upon whom having tried their Forces, with diversity of Captains, and variety of event, they vanquished the Falisci, and the Fidicenses, and utterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus shewed no less integrity than fortitude. For when a School-Master, by training forth into the Roman Camp, many Children of the principal Citizens, thought to betray the Town, yielding them all up as Hostages: Camillus delivered this Traytor bound unto his Scholars, willing them to whip him back into the City; which forthwith yielded unto him in reverence of his Justice. The Siege of Veii was ten years, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad under Beasts skins (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received Pay) and to make vows never to return without Victory.

At length, winning the City by a Mine, they got so large spoils, that they consecrated their Tents to Apollo Pythius; and the whole People in general, were called to the ransacking of the City. But yet they were no less unthankful to Camillus for his service, than before they had been to Corio- lanus; for they banished him the City, upon some occasion of inequality in dividing the spoils: yet he required their unkindness with a new piece of service, against the fury of the Gauls; who being a populous Country, and very healthful, the Fathers (as sometimes now) lived so long, that the Sons, destitute of means, were enforced to rove abroad, seeking some place, where to set up their rest; and withal being a Nation vast in Body, rude by Nature, and barbarous in Conditions, wandered as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italy, set upon Clusium, a Town in Hetruria; whereof Rome having information (and being careful of her Confederate Towns) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprises. But the barbarous People, not regarding the Message, upon some injury offered by the Roman Embassadors, converted their Forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow to the Romans, by the River Alia, upon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for unlucky, and (which day was after branded for unlucky, and called Alibis in the Roman Calendar) they hastened towards the City. Then was Rome the true map of misery and desolation. For some leaving the City, some creeping into holes, Priests hiding their Religion, and every one shifting for himself; the Enemy came, Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestal Virgins, in this Tumult, were safely conveyed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldness out of desperate fear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the World, did seat themselves in Thrones, in their several Houses, hourly expecting the Messengers of Death, and meaning to die, as they had lived, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Captain, took upon them to make good the Capitol.

By this, the Gauls were entered the City, who feng all quiet, at first suspected some Ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoil, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, that fate in their Majesty, with a grave resolution: having first revered them as Gods, anon they tried whether they would die like Men. When the City was thoroughly rifled, they attempted the Capitol; which held them work for the space of seven Months. Once they were like to have surprised it by Night, but being detected by the galling of Gele, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gauls being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls should take a thousand pound weight in Gold, to desist from their Siege. Whilset the Gold was in weighing, the Gauls, with open infidelity, made their weights too heavy: Brennus, their Captain, casting his Sword into the Balance, and, with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cavilling, came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell upon the Gauls with such violence, that he dispersed their Troops, quenched the fire of the City with their Blood, forcing them to restore the spoils with advantage, and to bear the Gold, in accepting which, they had lately been so fice. Further, having rid the City of them, he so hotly pursued them through a great part of Italy, that the remainder of their Army which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this first, had the like ill success. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the Victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in single fight flew a Champion of the Gauls) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable service, was afterwards accounted a second Numa.

The People, after this destruction of their City, were earnestly bent to go to the Veii to inhabit; but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the Siege of Veii, they changed their Government from Consuls to Military Tribunes. The government of these also, after some years, was by civil diffention interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled; another while there was an Anarchy: Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled again, till after many years expired, the Consular Authority was established; it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should always be a Plæbeian. This was after the building of the City, three hundred sixty five years. And now Rome, by suppression of her Neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minority, dars forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirty miles off; situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yield themselves Subjects to Rome, and undergo any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else, to obtain protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had been their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like Fifth, should devour the less, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corn and Wine, pleasant Cities and Towns, but especially Capua it self, the fairest City then in Italy.

The Families of the Patryii and Fabii were most employed in the managing of this War, which endured the space of thirty years. And in this season were the Romans often-times dangerously encountered by the Samnites; as when T. Veturius, and Sp. Posthumus were Consuls; and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominy; and when Q. Fabius Gurgus lost the Field with three thousand men. But for these losses, many great Victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papirius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their Quarrel. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but less warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome.

In the continuance of this long War it was, (though in time of Truce between the Romans and the Samnites) that the Latines began to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing Office, so that they required to have one of the Consuls yearly chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latines was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Colony; besides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any such Capitulation. So a great Battel was fought between them; wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the virtue of the Consuls.

Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Consuls, whom the Sooth-layers advertised, that the issue should be victorious which lost the General in Fight. Hereupon, Decius the Consul, exposed his life to the Enemy, and purchased Victory (as was believed) by his death. In which kind of devoting himself for his Army, the Son of this Decius, being after Consul, did imitate his Father, Father in the Hetrurian War. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decii, that purchased Victory, by rushing into the midst of the Enemies, wherein their Soldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a Religion as required the Lives of so worthy Citizens to be sacrificed for the Lives of the Country. The Discipline of Manlius was no less reformed than the Valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his Place, and fight single with an Enemy. For breach of which order, he caused his own Son to be put to death, who had slain a Captain of the Lutines, being challenged in single Fight.

When the Lutines, the Æqui, Volsci, Hernici, Comani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other People, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any People of Italy to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabinus adventured to try their Fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consul, waiving all their Country with Fire and Sword, from the River Nar and Velia, to the Adriaticque Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians that made trial of the Roman Arms, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as Mediators between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptory denunciation of War unto that Party which should dare to refuse the Peace by them tendered. These Threats, which discovered their bad affection to Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrel was found to examine their ability of performance.

The Romans complained that certain Ships of theirs were robbed; and sent Embassadors unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon some wrong done to these Embassadors, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucani, Messapians, Brutians, and Apulians, joining with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebel and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these People to know their own Weakness. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aid (being a Græcian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which already, in a manner it did overspread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two Battels.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and unable to deal with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to live in rest: which he abhorred no less than a wiser Prince would have desired. He had a strong Army, and a good Fleet, which in that unfused estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had so encreased the Power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom to make an offensive War upon him, without far greater forces. Antigonus, the Son of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Towns, with the remainder of his Fathers Army and Treasures left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serve to give some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of Employment, and covetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave Offers, as needing none other aid than his good Conduct, which to obtain, they would cast themselves under his Protection. They had in their company some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalf of their several Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly Conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as far as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and fill by one Victory open the Gate unto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cynas his chief Counsellor, asking what he meant to do after every of the Victories which he hoped to get: that, having won Rome, he would soon be Master of all Italy; that, after Italy, he would quickly get the Isle of Sicily; that out of Sicily he would pass over into Africa, and win Carthage, with all the rest of the Country; and being strengthened with the force of all these Provinces, he would be too hard for any of those that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cynas enquired yet further what they should do, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cynas then told him) that they presently might do, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his own.

Nevertheless this Italian expedition seemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any Scholastic Disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Army, of almost thirty thousand men, well fortified, and well trained Soldiers: part of which he sent over before him under Cynas, with the rest he followed in person. At his coming he found the Tarentines very prompt of Tongue, but in matter of Execution, utterly careless to provide for the War. Wherefore he was fain to shut up their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Arms, and making such a strict Muster, as was to them very unpleasant, though greatly beehowing to their Esteem.

Whilst he was occupied with these cares, Levinus, the Roman Consul drew near, and began to waste Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Country; the Samnites were careless of the harm, that fell not (as yet) upon themselves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would have been, but their Valour was little: all of these had been accustomed to shrink, for fear of the Roman Fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more upon his own Forces, than the issue of their vaunting Promises. He was now driven, either to set forward with those that himself had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all means he was careful to uphold. In good time a great part of his Forces that had been scattered by foul Weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which he resolved to assay the Valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Levinus the Consul was not affrighted with the terrible Name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and give him Battel are all his Adherents should be ready to joyn with him.

This

This boldness of the Roman, and the slackness of the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a Treaty of Peace: requiring to have the Quarrel between the Romans and his Italian Friends, referred to his Arbitrement. Whether he did this to win time, that the Samnites and their Fellows might arrive at his Camp; or whether, considering better at near distance, the weight of the business which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his Honour: the short answer that was returned to his Proposition, gave him no means of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this Word, that they had neither chosen him their Judge, nor feared him their Enemy.

Hereupon both Armies hastened their March unto the River of Siris: Levinus intending to fight, before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that River, until his own Army were full. Upon the first view of the Roman Camp, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to do with barbarous People, but with men well trained in a brave discipline of War: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde upon the Passage of the River, that he might not be compelled to fight, until he saw his best advantage. But he quickly found that this new Enemy was not only skilful in the Art of War, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Army entered the Ford in face of his Corps de garde; and their Horle, at the same time began to pass the River in sundry places: which caused the Greeks to forsake the defence of their Bank, and speedily retire unto their Camp.

This audacity forced Pyrrhus to Battel, where-with he thought it best to present them ere their whole Army had recovered firm footing, and were in order. So directing his Captains how to marshal his Battails, himself with the Horle charged upon the Romans, who stoutly received him, as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this Fight, neither did his Courage transport him beyond the duty of a careful General; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personal Valour. It behooved him indeed to do his best, for he never met with better Opposers. Once, and shortly after the Fight began, his Horle was slain under him: afterwards he changed Armour with a Friend; but that Friend paid his Life for the use of his Kings Armour, which was torn from his Back. This accident had almost lost him the Battel: but he perceiving it, discovered his Face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and took from the Romans their vain joy. The Fight was obstinate, and with the greater loss (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as only Spear and Sword were used. But when the Elephants were brought into the Wings, whose unusual form and terrible aspect the Horles of the Romans (unaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustain; then was the Victory quickly gotten. For the Roman Battails perceiving their Horle put to rout, and driven out of the Field; finding also themselves both charged in Flank, and overborn by the force and huge bulk of these strange Beasts; gave way to necessity, and saved themselves as well as they could by hasty flight: in which conflagration, they were so forgetful of their Discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Camp, but ran quite beyond it, leaving both it and the honour of the day entirely to Pyrrhus.

The Fame of this Victory was soon spread over Italy; and the Reputation was no less than the Fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consul, with a select Army, should lose in plain Battel, not only the Field, but the Camp it self, being so notably fortified as they always were. And this Honour was the more bravely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian Friends, save the unwelcome Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that he took, in having the glory of this Action peculiarly his own, at such time as he blamed the Lucani and Samnites for coming (as we say) a day after the fair. Nevertheless he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such as would better endure many such Losses, than he could many such Victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them, whilst with his Honour he might; and to that purpose he sent unto them Cynas his Embassador; demanding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himself accepted as their especial Friend. This did Cynas, with all his Cunning, and with liberal Gifts, labour to effect: but neither Man nor Woman could be found in Rome, that would take any Bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their Captives, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to Peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blind Senator, did stir them up to make good their Honour by War. So they returned answer, that whilst Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report that Cynas made at his return, of the Roman piuidance and Vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus a great desire of confederacy with that gallant City. Hereupon many kind Offices passed between them: but still when he urged his motion of Peace, the answer was, He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of Peace.

In the mean season each part made provision for War; the Romans levying a more mighty Army than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access unto his Forces, of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to trial of a second Battel, wherein (though after long and cruel fight) the boistrous violence of the Elephants gave to Pyrrhus a second Victory. But this was not altogether so joyful as the former had been: rather it gave him cause to say, that such another Victory would be his utter undoing. For he had lost the Flower of his Army in this Battel, and though he drove the Romans into their Camp, yet he could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood of prevailing against them that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilst he should be driven to spend upon his old Stock. Neither could he expect that his Elephants should always stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would soon teach the Romans, that were apt Scholars in such Learning, how to make them unserviceable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carry his Honour safe out of Italy: which to do (seeing the Romans would not help him, by offering or accepting any fair conditions of Peace or of Truce) he took a slight occasion, presented by Fortune, that followeth to be related.

whilst he was busy in getting his Men and Carriages a Ship-board. But the success was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the honour which they had brought upon Antigonus, they were so careless of the sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoil of what they found on the shore, and in such Ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Army had left Antigonus, where he lay in covert, and had faved it self by getting aboard the Fleet: in which number were some well experienced men of War, who discovering the much advantage offered unto them, by the desperate presumption of their Enemies, took courage, and encouraged others, to lay manly hold upon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gave so brave a charge upon the disordered Gauls, that their contemptuous boldness was thereby changed into sudden fear, and they, after a great slaughter, driven to cast themselves into the service of Antigonus.

The fame of this Victory, caused all the barbarous Nations in those Quarters, to re-entertain their ancient belief of the Macedonian Valour: by which, the terrible and relentless oppressors of so many Countreys, were overthrowen.

To speak more of the Gauls, in this place; and to show how, about these Times, three Tribes of them passed over into Asia the less, with their Wars and Conquests there; I hold it needless: the victorious Arms of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countreys which now they wan, shall give better occasion, to rehearse these Matters briefly.

Howsoever the good success of Antigonus got him Reputation, among the barbarous people; yet his own Souldiers, that without his leading, had won this Victory, could not thereupon be persuaded, to think him a good man of War: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the Service, wherein his conduct was no better, than creeping into a Wood.

This (as presently will appear) was greatly helpful unto Pyrrhus: though as yet, he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his Affairs in Italy stood upon hard terms, had sent unto Antigonus for help: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he fure to get, either a supply, wherewith to continue his War against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italy, under colour of making his word good, in seeking revenge. The threats which he had used in brevity, meer necessity forced him, at his return into Epirus, to put in practice.

He brought home with him, eight thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse: an Army too little to be employed, by his restless nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had means to keep in Pay. Therefore he fell upon Macedon: intending to take what Spoil he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this Business, two thousand of Antigonus's Souldiers, revolted unto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such fair beginnings, easily persuaded the courage of this daring Prince, to set upon Antigonus himself, and to hazard his fortune, in trial of a Battel, for the whole Kingdom of Macedon.

It appears, that Antigonus had no desire to fight, with this hot Warrior; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to weary him out of the Countrey. For Pyrrhus overtook him in a straight passage, and charged him in the Rear; wherein were the Gauls, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest proof that he was in retreat. The Gauls very bravely sustained Pyrrhus's impetion; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slain) after a sharp Fight: wherein it seems, that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalans within the Lights, and not advancing to their succour, took away their courage, by deceiving their expectation. The Captains of the Elephants were taken soon after; who, finding themselves exposed to the same violence, that had consumed so many of the Gauls, yielded themselves and the Beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort: which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalans could be charged only in a Front, it was a matter of extreme difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seen so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discovered to well their affections, that he adventured to draw near in person, and exhort them to yield. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. All forsook Antigonus, a few Horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small Forces left, and Money enough to entertain a greater Power, had he known where to levy it. But whilst he was thinking, how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his service; whereby he might repair his loss: Ptolemy, the Son of Pyrrhus, came upon him, and easily defeating his weak Forces, drove him to fly from the Parts about Macedon, to those Towns afar off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the World, and made himself a King.

This good success revived the spirits of the Epirs, and caused him to forget all sorrow, of his late misfortunes in the Roman War: so that he sent for his Son Helius (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come over into Greece, where was more matter of Conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

S. V.

How Pyrrhus assailed Sparta without success. His Enterprize, upon Argos, and his Death.

Pyrrhus had now conceived a great hope, that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing, that in open Fight, he had vanquished the Gauls, beaten Antigonus, and won the Kingdom of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor, indeed, in all the Lands that Alexander had won, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set up against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might do what he pleased. He raised therefore an Army, consisting of five and twenty thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and four and twenty Elephants; pretending War against Peloponnesus, and the giving liberty to those Towns in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great Preparations were made, for accomplishment of some Design more important, than War against a Prince already vanquished, and almost utterly dejected. Especially the Lacedaemonians feared this Expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrey, had betaken himself to Pyrrhus: who readily readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdom. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make shew of any displeasure, that he bare unto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to have two of his own younger Sons trained up in that City, as in a place of noble discipline. With such coarage he deluded men, even till he entred upon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himself as an open Enemy: excusing himself, and his former dissembling words, with a jest; That he followed herein the Lacedaemonian custom, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedaemonians, to deal in like fort with others, whom, in the time of their greatness, they sought to oppress: but now they complained of that, as fallhood, in Pyrrhus, which they always practiced as wisdom, till it made them distrustful, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Nevertheless, they were not wanting to themselves, in this dangerous extremity. For the old Men and Women laboured in fortifying the Town; causing such as could bear Arms, to reserve themselves fresh against the Assault: which Pyrrhus had unwisely deferred, upon assurance of prevailing.

Sparta was never fortified, before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soon after this (it being built upon uneven ground, and for the most part hard to approach) the lower and more accessible Places, were fenced with Walls; at the present, only Trenches were cast, and Barricades made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easy. Three days together it was assailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding fiercely; and no less stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved the Town the first day; whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded Horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindful of saving the Person of their King, than of breaking into the City, though already they had torn insunder the Barricades. Presently after this, one of Antigonus's Captains got into Sparta, with a good strength of men; and Arcus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his Friends in War) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Countrey stood, until he was almost at home. These Succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus a desire to prevail against all Impediments. But the third days word shewed, how great his error had been, in forbearing to assault the Town at his first coming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the Place, otherwise than by a long Siege: in which tedious course, he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Army, though not strong enough to meet the Enemy in plain Field, yet able to hinder all his Purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtful what way to take; being diversly affected, by the difficulty of his Enterprize in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first Attempt. Whilst he was thus perplexed, Letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promise, to deliver that City into his hands.

Civil Dissension raging then hotly in Argos, caused the Heads of several Factions, to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the coming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous, to rid their hands of such powerful Assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himself to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to save them from the tyranny of Pyrrhus; and that he would be gone if they needed not his help. On the other side, Pyrrhus would needs persuade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argives took small pleasure, in hearing the Fox and Kite at strife, which of them should keep the Chickens from his Enemy: and therefore prayed them both, to divert their Powers some other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily consented, and gave Hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in need of goodwill. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promise: Hostages he would give none, to his inferiors; especially, meaning deceit. This made them suspect his purpose to be such, as indeed, it was. Yet he less regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assurance, by giving such a Bond, as he intended to break ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the City should be opened by night unto Pyrrhus, by his Complotches within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Army, without any tumult, entred the City: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to pass the Gate. The taking off, and setting on again, of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarm to the City, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully master it. Argos was full of Ditches, which greatly hindered the Gauls (that had the Vanguard) being ignorant of the ways, in the dark night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by-passage: and letting upon the Enemies on all sides, did put them to great loss, and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore, understanding by the confused noise, and unequal shoutings of his own men, that they were in distress, entred the City in person, to take order for their relief, and assurance of the Place. But the darkness, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, until break of day. Then began he to make his passage by force, and so far prevailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that Place, the Image of a Wolf and a Bull, in such posture as if they had been combatant, he called to mind an Oracle, which threatened him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolf: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indeed, the coming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his own men; with divers ill accidents, gave him reasonable cause to have retired out of the City, though the Wolf and Bull had been away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gave back, so did others thrust forward, and the Argives pressing hard upon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retreat, with his own Sword. The tops of the Houses were covered with Women, that stood looking on the Fight. Among these was one, that saw her own Son in dangerous case, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore, she took a Tile-stone, or Slate, and threw it so violently down on the Head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground affrighted with the Blow; and lying in that case, had his Head cut off.

Thus ended the restless Ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his Life: and thus returned the Kingdom of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the Army, the Body, and the Children of his Enemy. The Body of Pyrrhus, had honourable ble Funeral, and was given by Antigonus unto Helorus his Son; which young Prince he graciously sent home, into his Fathers Kingdom of Epirus. From this time forwards, the Race of Antigonus, held the Kingdom of Macedon; the Posterity of Seleucus, reigned over Asia and Syria; and the House of Ptolemy had quiet possession of Egypt: until such time, as the City of Rome, swallowing all up, digested these, among other Countreys, into the body of her own Empire.

A discussion of that Problem of Livie; Whether the Romans could have resisted the great Alexander? That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equal Valour to the English.

H A T Question handled by Livie; Whether the great Alexander could have prevailed against the Romans, if after his Eastern Conquest, he had been all his Forces against them, hath been, and is, the subject of much dispute; which (as it seems to me) the Arguments on both sides do not so well explain, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath given, of the Roman Power, in his days. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibal's judgment) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with small strength of Men, and little store of Money, or of other needful helps in War, vanquish them in two Battels, and endanger their Estate, when it was well settled, and held the best part of Italy under a confirmed Obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needful to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of Employment, coming upon them before their Dominion was half so well settled. It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more than thirty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse (as indeed, at his first passage into Asia, he Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank: and so shall he perceive that will note the circumstances of almost any one Battle. This takes away all objection, for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one Flight of Arrows, or two at the most, can be delivered before they close. Neither is it in general true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Cross-Bow; but this is the rare effect of an extraordinary Arm; whereupon can be grounded no common Rule. If any man shall ask, How then came it to pass that the English won so many great Battles, while the English was not to be beat, with besting no advantage to help him? I may, with best commendation of Modesty, refer him to the French Historian: who relating the Victory of our Men at Crecant, where they passed a Bridge in face of the Enemy, useth these words; *The English comes with a conquering Bravery, as he that was accustomed to gain every where, without any loss: he forceth our Guard placed upon the Bridge to let, the Passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Author, where he tells how the Britons being invaded by Charles, King of France, thought it good policy to apparel a thousand and two hundred of their own Men in English Cal-lacks; hoping that the very sight of the English red Cross, would be enough to terrify the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all report Wonders of our Nation) the Poyntion which first I undertook to maintain; that the Military Virtue of the English, prevailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was assisted with all advantages that could be desired. If it be demanded: Why then did not our Kings finish the Conquest, as Caesar had done? my answer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the Race of the Ætæides, of whom the old Poet Ænnius gave this Note; Belli potentes, ante magis quam politici potentes; They were more warlike than politic. Who so notes their proceedings, may find, that none of them went to work like a Conqueror: save only King Henry the Fifth, the course of whose Victories, it pleased God to interrupt by his Death. But this Question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the Conquest of Gaul, before the time of Caesar? Why not after the Macedonian War? Why not after the third Punic, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good leisure: and then especially had they both leisure, and fit opportunity, when under the Conduct of Marinus, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Tutones, by whom the Country of Gaul had been pitciously wasted. Surely, the words of Tully were true; that with other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion; with the Gauls for preservation of their own safety.*

Therefore they attempted not the Conquest of Gaul, until they were Lords of all other Countries to them known. We on the other side, held only the one half of our own Island; the other half being inhabited by a Nation (unless perhaps in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferior) every way equal to our selves; a Nation, anciently and strongly allied to our Enemies the French, and in that regard, Enemies to us. So that our danger lay both before and behind us: and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, always we feared, a stronger invasion by Land, than we could make upon France, transporting our Forces over Sea.

It is usual with men that have pleased themselves, in admiring the matters which they find in ancient Histories; to hold it a great injury done to their Judgment, if any take upon him, by way of companion, to extol the things of later Ages. But I am well persuaded, that as the divided Virtue of this our Island, hath given more noble proof of it self; than under so worthy a Leader, that Roman Army could do, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Caesar a Monarch; so hereafter, by Gods blessing, who hath converted our greatest hindrance into our greatest help, the Enemy that shall dare to try our Forces, will find cause to wish, that avoiding us, he had rather encountered as great a puissance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying aside comparisons, we return to the rehearsal of deeds done: wherein we shall find how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italy, to strive with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punic War.

§. II.

The Estate of Carthage, before it entered into War with Rome.

THE City of Carthage had stood above six hundred years, when first it began to contend with Rome for the Mastery of Sicily. It forewent Rome one hundred and fifty years in antiquity of Foundation; but in the Honour of great Achievements, it excelled far beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa it self, from the west part of Cyrene, to the Streights of Hercules, about one thousand and five hundred miles in length, wherein stood three hundred Cities. It had subjected all Spain, even to the Pyrenean Mountains, together with all the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the west of Sicily, and of Sicily the better part. It flourished about seven hundred and thirty years, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: who besides other Spoils, and all that the Souldiers reserved, carried thence four hundred and seventy thousand weight of Silver, which make of our Money (if our Pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thousand pound Sterling. So as this glorious City ran the same Fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and since. The Ruine of the goodliest pieces of the World, fore-shews the dissolution of the whole.

About one hundred years after first time as it was cast down, the Senate of Rome caused it to be rebuilt, and by Gracchus it was called Jæmia: it was again and again abandoned and re-peopled, taken and re-taken; by Genfericus the Vandal, by Belisarius under Justinian, by the Perfians, by the Egyptians, and by the Mabometans. It is now nothing. The Seat thereof was exceeding strong: and, while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, invincible. For the Sea compassed it about, saving that it was eyed to the Main by a neck of Land, which passage had two mile and more of breadth (Appian saith three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced to believe the common report, that the City it self was above twenty mile in compass; if not that of Strabo, affirming the Circuit to have been twice as great.

It had three Walls without the Wall of the City, and between each of those, three or four Streets with Vaults under ground of thirty foot deep, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants and all their Food. Over these they had Stables for four thousand Horse, and Granaries ries for all their Provender. They had also Lodging in these Streets between these out-walls for four thousand Horse-men, and twenty thousand Foot-men, which (according to the Discipline used now by those of China) never pestered the City. It had towards the South part, the Cattle of Byssa; to which Servius gives two and twenty furlongs in compass, that make two mile and a half. This was the same piece of ground which Dido obtained of the Lybians, when she got leave to buy only so much Land of them, as she could sow with an Ox Hide. On the West side it had also the Salt Sea, but in the nature of a standing Pool; for a certain Arm of Land fastned to the ground on which the City stood, stretched it self toward the west Continent, and left but seventy foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenal, having their Ships and Gallies riding under it.

The Form of their common-wealth resembled that of Sparta; for they had titulary Kings, and the Aristocratical Power of Senators. But (as Regius well observeth) the People in later times usurped too great authority in their Councils. This confusion in Government, together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forceable causes of their Ruine, were their Avarice and their Cruelty.

Their Avarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary Tributes) the one half of the Fruits of the Earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not upon gentle and merciful persons, but upon those who could best tyrannize over the People, to augment their Treasures. Their cruelty appeared in putting them to death without mercy, that had offended through ignorance. The one of these rendered them odious to their Vassals, whom it made ready, upon all occasions, to revolt from them: the other did break the Spirits of their Generals, by presenting, in the heat of their actions abroad, the fear of a cruel Death at home. Hereby it came to pass, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian Forces, after some great loss received, have desperately cast themselves, with all that remained under their Charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repair their losses quickly, or to ruin all together: and few of them have dared to manage their own best Projects after that good form, wherein they first conceived them, for fear, lest the manner of their proceeding should be misinterpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to cruciate, not only the unhappy Captain, but even him whose bad Council had prosperous event. The Faults, wherein, in general, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians I find to be these; Lust, Cruelty, Avarice, Craft, Unfaithfulness, and Perjury.

Whether the Romans themselves were free from the same Crimes, let the trial be referred unto their actions. The first League between Carthage and Rome was very ancient: having been made the year following the Expulsion of Tarquin. In that League, the Carthaginians had the superiority, as imposing upon the Romans the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as have Trade in some part of Affrica, nor suffer any Ship of theirs to pass before the Head-land, or Cape, then called the fair Promontory, unless it were by force of Tempest: whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italy was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second League was made long after, which (howsoever it hath pleased Livie to say, that the Romans granted it ^{to the Carthaginians} intreaty) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to have Trade in any part of Africa, or in the Island of Sardinia.

By these two Treaties it may appear, that the Carthaginians had an intent, not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other People) from getting any knowledge of the State of Affrica; but to countenance and uphold them in their troubling all Italy, whereby they themselves might have the better means to occupy all Sicily, whilst that Island should be destitute of Italian Succours. Hereupon we find good cause of the Joy that was in Carthage, and the Crown of Gold weighing twenty and five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were overthrown. But the little State of Rome prevailed faster in Italy, than the great Power of Carthage did in Sicily. For that mighty Army of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Affrica into Sicily, was consumed by Pestilence; many great Fleets were devoured by Tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their own Valour, or by assistance of their good Friends out of Greece, did at some other time repair their own losses, and take revenge upon these Invaders. But never were the People of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicily, than when the Death of Agathocles the Tyrant had left the whole Island in combustion; the Estate of Greece being such at the same time, that it seemed impossible for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were busy in making their advantage of this good opportunity; Pyrrhus, invited by the Tarentines and their Fellows, came into Italy, where he made sharp War upon the Romans. These News were unpleasant to the Carthaginians, who, being a seditious Nation, easily forebore, that the same bubble disposition, which had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italy, would as easily transport him over into Sicily, as soon as he could finish his Roman War. To prevent this danger, they sent Mago Embassador to Rome, who declared in their Name, that they were sorry to hear what misadventure had befallen the Romans, their good Friends in this War, with Pyrrhus; and that the People of Carthage were very willing to assist the State of Rome, by sending an Army into Italy; if their help were thought needful against the Epirots.

It was indeed, the main desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his Work in Italy, that they might, at good leisure, pursue their business in Sicily, which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high minded, and refused to accept any such aid of their Friends, lest it should blench their Reputation, and make them seem unable to stand by their own strength. Yet the Meflage was taken lovingly, as it ought, and the former League between Rome and Carthage renewed, with Covenants added, concerning the present business; That if either of the two Cities made Peace with Pyrrhus, it should be, with reservation of Liberty to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, using all means to found his intentions (a matter very difficult where one upon every new occasion changeth his own purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicily, where, though in fine, he was neither getter nor faver, yet he clean defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaving them at his departure thence, as far from any end, as when they first began.

So many disasters in an enterprise, that from the first undertaking, had been so strongly pursued through the length of many Generations might well have induced the Carthaginians to believe, that an higher providence resisted their intentment. But their desire of winning that fruitful Island, was so inveterate, that with unwearied patience, they still continued in hope of so much the greater Harvest, by how much their cost and pains therein buried had been the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force or practise, recovered in few years all their old Possessions: making Peace with Syracuse, the chief City of the Island, that so they might the better enable themselves to deal with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a Troop of Campanian Soldiers, that had served under Agathocles, being entertained within Messina as Friends, and finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, took advantage of the Power that they had to do wrong, and with perfidious cruelty, drew those that trusted them, which done, they occupied the City, Lands, Goods, and Wives of those whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamerines. Good Soldiers they were, and like enough it is, that meer desperation of finding any that would approve their barbarous Treachery, added Rage unto their Stoutness. Having therefore none other colour of their proceedings, than the Law of the Stronger, they over-ran the Country round about them.

In this course, at first they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messina against the Cities of Sicil Confederate; to wit, against the Syraculians, and others; but they rather won upon them, yea, and upon the Carthaginians, exacting Tributes from many neighbour places. But it was not long ere Fortune turning her Back to these Mamerines, the Syraculians men fast upon them, and finally confining them within the Walls of Messina, they also with a powerful Army besieged the City. It happened ill, that about the same time a contention began, between the Syraculan Soldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Governors of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Army elected two Governors among themselves; to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his years excellently adorned with many Vertues, although it was contrary to the Policy of that State, to approve any Election made by the Soldiers, yet for the great Clemency he used at his first entrance, was by general consent, established and made Governour. This Office he rather used as a Scale, thereby to climb to fame higher degree, than rested content with his present Preferment.

In brief, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himself within the City, and somewhat without it, that gave impediment to his obtaining, and safe keeping of the Place he sought; to wit, a powerful Party within the Town, and certain mutinous Troops of Soldiers without, often and easily moved to Sedition and Tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himself, he took to Wife the Daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest Estimation and Authority among the Syraculians. For the second, leading out the Army to besiege Messina, he quartered all those Companies which he held suspected, on the one side of the City, and leading the rest of his Horse and Foot unto the other side, as if he would have assaulted it in two several parts, he marched away under the covert of the Town Walls, and left the Mutinies to be cut in pieces by the Affixed: So returning home, and leaving an Army of his own Citizens, well trained and obedient, he halted again towards Messina, and was by the Mamerines (grown proud by their former Victory over the Mutinies) encountered in the Plains of Myleum, where he obtained a most signal Victory, and leading with him their Commander Captive into Syracuse, himself by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamerines finding themselves utterly intebled, some of them resolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the several Factions, dispatched Embassadors for the same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soon ready to lay hold upon the good Offer: so that a Captain of theirs got into the Castle of Messina, whereof they that had sent for him gave him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captain, either by force or by cunning, was turned out of doors, and the Town reserved for other Masters.

These News did much offend the People of Carthage; who crucified their Captain, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Army to besiege Messina, as a Town that rebelled, having once been theirs. Hieron, the new made King of Syracuse (to gratify his People, incensed with the smart of Injuries lately received) added his Forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entered into a League, for exterminating the Mamerines out of Sicil. So the Mamerines on all sides were closed up within Messina, the Carthaginians lying with a Navy at Sea, and with an Army on the one side of the Town, whilst Hieron with his Syraculians, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appius Claudius, the Roman Consul, with an Army to the Straights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacity, he put himself into the Town, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying unto them, that the Mamerines were now become confederate with the People of Rome, and that therefore he was come to give them protection, even by force of War, if reason would not prevail.

This Meflage was utterly neglected; And so began the War between Rome and Carthage; wherein it will be time to shew, on which part was the justice of the Quarrel, when some actions

actions of the Romans, lately foregoing this, have been first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the first Punic War. That it was unjustly undertaken by the Romans.

When Pyrrhus began his Wars in Italy, the City of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not only desiring to be taken by the Epirots, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize upon it in that busy time, sought aid from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of four thousand Soldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect, by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the Fact of the Mamerines, committed in Messina (a City in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise divided than by a narrow Sea, which severeth it from Italy) and rather weighing the greatness of the Boory, than the odiousness of the Villainy by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like Purchase, by taking the like wicked Course. Considering therefore themselves with the Mamerines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; dividing the spoil, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and People of Rome, of this Outrage, they finding their Honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the World made a more severe Profession of Justice than they did, during all the time of their growing Greatness) resolved, after a while, to take revenge upon the Offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenced the Fires kindled in Italy by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulness of their Fact, hopeless of Pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution, and yet in the end, the Assaults forced them, and those which escaped the present Fury, were brought bound to Rome, where after the usual Torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custom of the Country, they had their Heads stricken from their Shoulders; and the People of Rhegium were again restored to their former Liberties and Estates.

This Execution of Justice being newly performed, and the Fame thereof founding honourably through all quarters of Italy: Messengers came to Rome from Messina, desiring help against the Carthaginians and Syraculians, that were in a readiness to inflict the like Punishment upon the Mamerines, for the like Offence. An impudent Request it was, which they made: who having both given example of that Villainy to the Roman Soldiers, and helped them with joynt Forces to make it good; intreat the Judges to give them that assistance, which they were wont to receive from their Fellow Thieves.

The Romans could not suddenly resolve whether the way of Honesty or of Profit were to be followed; they evermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered how contrary the course of succouring the Mamerines was, to their former Councils and Actions, seeing for the same Offences they had lately put to Torment and to the Sword their own Soldiers, and restored the Oppressed to their Liberty. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best parts of Africa, of the Mediterranean Islands, of a great part of Spain, and some part of Sicil it self; whilst also they feared, that Syracuse therein feared (a City in Beauty and Riches, little, at that time, inferior to Carthage, and far superiour to Rome it self) might become theirs; the safety of their own Estate spake for these Mamerines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliver (up Messina, with those other holds, that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand between Carthage; and the Lordship of all Sicil: for Syracuse it self could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians, that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten upon that Passage from the main Land. It was further considered, that the opportunity of Messina was such, as would not only debar all succours out of the Continent, from arrival in Sicil; but would serve as a Bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italy at their own pleasure.

These considerations of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers that threatened from afar, did so prevail, above all regard of Honesty, that the Mamerines were admitted into confederacy with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consul, presently dispatched away for Messina: into which he entered, and undertook the protection of it, as it shewed before. The Besiegers were little troubled with his arrival; and less moved with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did far exceed him in number of men; the whole Island was ready to relieve them in their Wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Town. All this Appius himself well understood: and against all this, he thought the stiff metal of his Roman Soldiers a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the Field, and to let the Enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Town; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficial to him, that the Enemy lay incamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in distress. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his own numerous Followers, not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his own Quarter, without help of others. Against him Appius Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected fallies, to surprize his Trenches) arranged his men in order of battle, whereupon he presented him. The Syraculan wanted not courage to fight; but surely, he wanted good advice: rage to fight; he not have hazarded all his Power against an Enemy, of whom he had made no trial; when it had been easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his own Camp. It may be, that he thought to get Honour, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his Reign. But he was well beaten, and driven to leave himself within his Trenches: by which loss he learned a point of Wisdom, that stood him in his Kingdom in good stead all the days of his Life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syraculians so busy in helping those of Carthage against the Mamerines.

Had Messina been taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it self must have sought help from Rome, against those Friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had, (in respect of those two mighty Cities) but a small flock, which it behooved him to govern well: such another loss would have made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake up his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Army gone, did with great courage, and with much alacrity of his Souldiers, give charge upon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the Enemy forsook both Field and Camp, leaving all the Country open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege unto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes of attaining to greater matters, than at first they had expected. Yet did they not imprint any form of terror in the City of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had been prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of War from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable to consider of those grounds whereupon the Romans entered into this War; not now probable that they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honesty (for questionless the enterprise was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict terms of lawfulness, whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yield themselves, and that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanians, distressed by the Sannites, had done) I cannot find, neither can I find how the messengers of those Folk, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such friendship, in the publick Name of all their Company.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawful surrender of themselves and their Possessions, were become subject unto Rome, by what better Title could the Romans assist the Mamertines against their most ancient Friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanians against the Sannites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point serving to clear this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtless it is, that no company of Pirates, Thieves, Outlaws, Murderers, or such other Malefactors, can, by any good favours of their Villany, obtain the privilege of civil Societies, to make League or Truce, yea, or to require fair War: but are by all means, as most pernicious Vermin, to be rooted out of the World. I will not take upon me to maintain that Opinion of some Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his Faith with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold, that no one Prince or State can give protection to such as these, as long as any other is using the Sword of Vengeance against them, without becoming accessory to their Crimes. Wherefore we may esteem this action of the Romans, so far from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacy made with them; as that contrariwise, by admitting this Nest of Murderers and Thieves into their Protection, they justly deserved to be warned upon themselves by the People of Sicily; yea, although Messina had been taken, and the Mamertines all slain, are any News of this Confederacy had been brought unto the Bessagers. The great Alexander was so far perverted herein; that he did put to Sword all the Branchidae (a People in Sydicene) and razed their City, not withstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were descended from a Company of Melissians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Town and Country, which those of their Posterity enjoyed. Nevertheless, in course of humane Justice, long and peaceable possession gives ius acquiritum, a kind of Right by prescription, unto that which was at first obtained by wicked means: and doth free the Defendants from the Crime of their Ancestors, whose Villanies they do not exercise. But that the same Generation of Thieves, which by a detestable Fact hath purchased a rich Town, should be acknowledged a lawful Company of Citizens, there is no shew of Right. For even the Conqueror, that by open War obtaineth a Kingdom, doth not confirm his Title by those Victories which gave him first possession; but length of time is requisite to establish him, unless by some alliance with the Ancient Inheritors, he can better the violence of his Claim, as did our King Henry the first, by his Marriage with Maud, that was Daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots; by Margaret, the Niece of Edmond Ironside. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of Justice in this quarrel, than had the Goths, Huns, Vandals, and other Nations of the Wars that they made upon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her self, in the time of her Vilitation, was burnt to the ground.

§. IV.

Of the Island of Sicil.

† I.

The Quality of the Island: and the first Inhabitants thereof.

THE defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messina, being now no longer, since the first Victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize for which Rome and Carthage are about to contend: it will be agreeable unto the order, which in the like cases we have observed, to make a brief Collection of things concerning that noble Island, which hath been the Stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this present War.

That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demy Isle, adjoynd to Italy, as a part of Bruttium in Calabria near unto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest severed from the same: is a general opinion of all antiquity. But at what certain time this division happened, there is no memorial remaining in any ancient Writer. Strabo, Pliny, and Dionysius affirm, that it was caused by an Earthquake; Strabo, and Cassiodorus, do think it to have been done by the rage and violence of the Tide and Surges of the Sea. Either of these Opinions may be true; for so was Euboea severed from Boeotia; Asiatike and Macedonia from Europe; Sicilia here in England, from the Cape of Exmouth; and Britain it self (as may seem by Pliny and Cornwall arguments) from the opposite Continent of Gaul. But for Sicil, they which lend their ears to Fables, do attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Ennius witnesseth) who with his three forked Mace, in favour of Jocastus, the Son of Atlas, divided it from the main land, and so made it an Island

Island, which before was but a Demy Isle, that by that means he might the more fairly inhabit and possess the same. Diodorus Siculus, moved by the authority of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of fundering it from Italy, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the Rocks and Mountains) first opened the Sicilian Sreights, as Hercules did thole of Gibraltar.

They which value the Islands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantity and content, do make this the greatest, as Eustathius and Strabo, who affirm this, not only to excel the rest for bigness, but also for goodness of Soil. As concerning the form of this Island, Pomponius Mela saith, it is like that Capital Letter of the Greeks, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the Figure of a Triangle; which is generally known to be true. That the whole Island was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old Writers with one consent affirm. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of sowing and sowing cause; (which Plutarch and Diodorus do report for truth) that Phaon, as soon as she, uncovering her self, first shew'd herself to be seen of him, gave her the Dominion thereof.

Of the Fertility and Riches of this Country, there is a famous Testimony written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he saith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granary, and Strabo saith, it is the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the culgar sort. The same Cicero doth add in that place, that it was not only the Store-house of the People of Rome: but also that it was accounted for a well furnished Treasury. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath usually clothed, maintained, and furnished our greatest Armies with Leather, Apparel, and Corn. Strabo repeateth almost the same thing of it. Whether Sicily doth yield (saith Strabo) whether by the Sun and temperature of the Air, or by the industry and labour of Man, it is accounted next unto those things that are of best estimation: were it not, that such things, as the Earth first putteth forth, are extremely overgrown with Saffron. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the Fields near unto Leontium, and in divers other places of this Island, Wheat doth grow of it self, without any labour or looking to of the Husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it fix Colonies, and sixty Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the Names are found scatteringly in many good Authors.

Now besides many famous acts done by the People of this Island, as well in Peace as War; there be many other things which have made it very renowned, as the Birth of Ceres; the ravishing of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus, the Mount Ætna, Sylla and Chariddes, with other Antiquities and Rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes; the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painful Historian Diodorus, and Epicharmus the deep Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first peopled and inhabited by Giants Levrigones, and Cyclopes, barbarous People, and uncivil; all Histories and Fables do jointly with one consent avow. Yet Theophrastus saith, that these savage People dwelt only in one part of the Island. Afterward the Sicani, a People of Spain possessed it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Isle (although some do so think) Theophrastus and Diodorus do constantly avouch.

Of those it was named Sicani. These Sicani were invaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterwards built, were driven by the Pelagi from their own Soils, and finding no place upon the Continent, which they were able to master and inhabit, passed over into this Island three hundred years before the Greeks sent any Colonies thither: and (saith Philistus) eighty years before the Fall of Troy. These Siculi gave the name of Sicilia, to the Island; and making War upon the Sicani, drove them from the East and Northern part thereof into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the City Zancle, afterward called Messina; and after that Catana, Leontium, and Syracuse; it self, beating from thence the Ætoliens, who long before had set up a Town in that place. As for the name of Syracuse, it was not known, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) won that part of the Island from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arrival dispossess the Ætoliens thereof, but some hundred years after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Nea, Hibla, Trinacia, and divers others.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These fate down in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Morgentium, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were divided, and by a Civil War greatly infested. Among these ancient stories, we find the last Voyage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Theophrastus, an Historian of unquestionable sincerity, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Islands: and some such business, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Daedalus. The Tale goes thus: Daedalus fleeing the revenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocclus, King of the Sicani, and during his abode there, he built a place of great strength, near unto Megara, for Cocclus to lay up his Treasure in; together with many notable Works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ram in Gold, that was set up in the Temple of Venus Erycina; which he did with so great art, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be living, than counterfeit.

Now Minos hearing that Cocclus had entertained Daedalus, prepares to invade the Territory of Cocclus; but when he was arrived, Cocclus doubting his own strength, promitteth to deliver Daedalus. This he performs not, but in the mean while kills Minos by Treason, and perfwades the Cretans, Minos his Followers, to inhabit a part of Sicil; the better (as it seems) to strengthen himself against the Sicani. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gave their consent, and builded for themselves the City of Minoa, after the Name of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Town of Ergium, now called Gange; and there were the first Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two Ages before the War of Troy; for the Grand-children of Minos served with the Greeks at the siege thereof.

But after such time as the Cretans understood, that their King had by Treason been made away; they gathered together a great Army to invade Cocclus; and landing near unto Camicus, they besieged the same five years, but in vain. In the end (being forced to return without any revenge taken) they were wrackt on the Coast of Italy; and having no means to repair their Ships, nor the Honour they had lost, they made good the Place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, between War, they sent into Demaratus, Gelon's Wife, a Crown, valued at an hundred Talents of Gold, with other Presents. Whereby we see that some Nations and some Nations are much the better for being well beaten. The Wars ended, and Sicil in Peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the Gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Successor his Brother Hiero. Philistru and Pliny report, That when his Body was burnt, according to the custom of that Age, a Dog of his, which always waited on him, ran into the Fire, and suffered himself to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his Brother succeeded; a man rude, cruel, covetous, and so suspicious of his Brethren Polyspathus and Thrahybulus, as he fought by all means to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; means to the conversation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the study of good Arts. Divers quarrels he had, as well with Theron of Aggrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he floridly after compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicil, fearing the Succours which Gelon had prepared, to aid the Gracians against him. He also overthrew in Battle, Thrahybulus the Son of Theron, and thereby restored the Aggrigentines to their former Liberty. But in the end he lost the Love of the Syracusians; and after he had reigned eleven years, he left the Kingdom to his Brother Thrahybulus, who became a most unjust and bloody Tyrant. Thrahybulus enjoyed his Principality no longer than ten months. For notwithstanding the force of mercenary Soldiers, which he entertained for his Guards, he was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acradina, he restored the Government, and was banished the Island. From thence he sailed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusians recovered again their former Liberty, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had never fought, had the Successors of Gelon inherited his Virtue, as they did the Principality of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preservation ought to answer the acquisition. Where a liberal, valiant, and advised Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his own, or exalted himself from being a private man, to the Dignity of a Prince; it behoveth the Successor to maintain it by the same way and art by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blows, ere she could cleanse her self of the Creatures and Lovers of Gelon) was now again become Mistress of her self, and held her self free well near three score years, to the time of Dionysius; though the were in the mean while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her own called Tyranno.

Now, to prevent the greatness of any one among them, for the future, they devised a kind of banishment of such among them as were suspected; taking pattern from the Athenian Ostracism. They called this their new devised Judgment of exile, Petalism, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive Leaf (as at Athen they wrote upon Shells) the name of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five years. Hereby, in a short time it came to pass, that those of Judgment, and best able to govern the Common-wealth, were by the worst able, either suppressed or thrust out of the City. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more security, wherein to maintain themselves. And good reason they had so to do; seeing there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerful and authorized Ignorance. But this Law lasted not long. For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore again the wiser sort to the Government; from which, the Nobility having practised to banish one another, the State became altogether popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Island (who had already taken Emma, and some other of the Gracian Cities, and overthrowing the Army of the Aggrigentines) the Syracusians sent Forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolon. This their Captain made nothing more than to find Ducetius, against whom he was employed, as he did to flee from the Army he led, as soon as Ducetius presented him Barrel. So, for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they lay other Troops; by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitted himself, and is constrained to leave the Island for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned again, and built the City Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a sort acknowledge Syracuse: Trinacia excepted; which also by force of Arms, in the four score and fifth Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they do not long enjoy this their superintendency. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppressed by them, seek aid from the Athenians, about the fifth year of the Peloponnesian War, in this Suit they prevailed by the Eloquence of Gorgias their Orator, and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, under the leading of Laches, and Chorades. To this Fleet the Leontines and their Partners added one hundred more; with which Forces, and with some Supplies brought by Sepholes, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their Partisans; war and lost divers places; took Messena; and in the seventh year of the Peloponnesian War, lost it again. They also, at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vain. The Fire of this Quarrel took hold upon many Cities, which invaded each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands, and yet could see no issue of the War; the Leontines, without the advice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians, and were admitted into their Society with equal freedom. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatness themselves in Sicil, by the division and civil War, were disappointed of their Expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and lain to be gone with the broken remainder of their Fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custom of popular Estates) by taking revenge upon their own Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sepholes, and laid an heavy Fine upon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable War that ever was made by the Greeks in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians against the Cities Selimumnes and Syracusians, in favour of the Cities Selimumnes, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selimumnes had oppressed the Egeffians; and they of Syracuse the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the War. For the Athenians undertook the protection of their old Friends: And in hatred of the Athenians, Aid from Lacedaemon was sent to the Syracusians. The Lacedaemonians make plainly, having none other end than that which they pretended, namely, to help a People of their own Tribe, that craved their succour, being in distress. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to be none other than the Conquest of the whole Island. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their own passions, that they would not believe their own eyes, which presented unto them a Fleet and Army far greater than the terrible report of Fame had made it.

In this Expedition, the City of Athen had engaged all her Power; as regarding, not only the greatness of the Enterprise, but the necessity of it in a short space of time. For the Lacedaemonians (as hath already been shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken terms of Peace with Athen, as differed not much from open War. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare no cost in this great expedition, or altogether to forbear it, which was likely to be hindered by Wars at Home, if their proceedings were slack abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians been over-patience, the Arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstain from to chargeable a business, and to reserve their Forces for a more needful use. But young Counsels prevailed against the Authority of ancient men, that were more regardful of Safety than of Honour.

Of this business, mention hath been already made, in that which we have written of the Peloponnesian War. But what was there delivered in general terms, as not concerning the Affairs of Greece, otherwise than by consequence; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter wherein the whole State of Sicil was like to have felt a great conversion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the People to this great Voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chief Commanders therein.

These had commission and direction, as well to succor the Egeffians, and to re-establish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracusians, as also by force of Arms, to subject the Syracusians, and all their adherents in Sicil, and compel them by Tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captains were sent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and five thousand one hundred Soldiers, besides the thirty Ships of Burden, which transported their Victuals, Engines, and other Munitions for the War: and these were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodiens, and Candians: there were besides these, six thousand Megarians light armed, with thirty Horse-men.

With these Troops and Fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to give them entry; but sell them Victuals for their Money. From thence they tent to the Egeffians, to know what Treasure they would contribute towards the War, seeing, for their sakes, they had entered thither. But they found by their Answers, that these Egeffians were poor, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shews of Gold, having in all but thirty Talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient Friends, and allied unto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias advised them to depart towards the Selimumnes, and to force them, or persuade them to an agreement with the Egeffians; as likewise to see what Disburments the Egeffians could make; and to return again into Greece, and not to waste Athen in a needless War. Alcibiades on the other side, would solicit the Cities of Sicil to Confederacy against the Syracusians, and Selimumnes, whereby to force them unto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, he persuaded them to assail Syracuse if self, before they were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they purpize Catana: and there they take new Counsel how to proceed. Thence they employed Nicias to those of Egeffa, who received from them thirty Talents towards his Charges; and one hundred and twenty Talents more there were of the Spoils they had gotten in the Island. Thus, the Summer being spent in idle consultations and vain attempts, the Athenians prepare to assail Syracuse. But Alcibiades having been accused at home in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians to make his answer, and the Army was left to the Conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtain a landing place very near unto Syracuse, by this device.

They imploir to Syracuse an Inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him to promise unto the Syracusians, that he would deliver in to their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their best Forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians setting sail for Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at fair ease, and fortify themselves against the Town. Shortly after this they fight, and the Syracusians have the Loss; but the Athenians wanting Horse, could not pursue their Victory to any great effect. They then retire themselves with a resolution to refresh their Army for the Winter-season. From thence at Catana, for the Winter-season, hoping to have made an attempt upon Messena, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the City to the Messinians. This he now did, in despite of his own Citizens the Athenians, because they had recalled him from his Command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof being assured or to have banished him: whereof being assured of his Friends, he took his way towards the Lacedaemonians; and to them he gave mischievous Counsel against his Country. While this Winter lasted, the Syracusians sent Embassadors to Lacedaemon and Corinth for aid: as likewise the Athenian Captains in Sicil, sent to Athen for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Peloponnesian War) the Athenians in Sicil, sail from the Port of Catana to Megara, forsaken of the Inhabitants; from whence foraging the Country, they obtain some small Victories over the stragling Syracusians; and at their return to Catana, they receive a supply of two hundred men at arms, but without Horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Island, from the Segestans, and other their Adherents: they were also strengthened with a Company of Archers, and with three hundred Talents in Money.

Hereupon they took courage, and incamp near Syracuse, upon the Banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusians that failed to impeach their Inrenchments. They also received from the Confederates four hundred Horse-men, with two hundred other Horse, to mount their men at Arms. Syracuse was now in effect blockt up, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their Passage: yet the Athenians receive divers losses; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders was slain.

In the mean while, Gylippus and Pytho, with the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian forces arrive, and take land at Himera. The Citizens of Himera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, join with them, so that with these and his own Troops, Gylippus adventured to march over land towards Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their Forces to meet him and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arrival near unto the City, upon a place of advantage. At the first encounter they had the better of their Enemies, by reason that the Syracusan Horse-men could not come to fight in those Streights: but soon after, Gylippus charging them again, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortifie himself within his Camp. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his Affairs known by his Letters to the Athenians; shewing, that without great Supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the small Army remaining. These Letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon, and Demosthenes, to join with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supply; the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the mean while Gylippus at Syracuse fights with the Athenians, both by Sea and Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good success: but in conclusion, he took from them their Fort near unto Syracuse, at the Promontory called Phymomyrium; wherein the Athenians lost their Treasure, and a great part of all their Provisions. Notwithstanding which loss, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedæmonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the War in Sicily, and dispatched away Demosthenes with new Succours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicily, encountered with Polyarchus the Corinthian with his Fleet: both the Captains being bound for Sicily; the one to succour Nicias, the other Gylippus. The loss between them was in effect equal; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the Enterprise they had in hand. But before the Succours arrived to either, Gylippus and Ariston had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demosthenes arrived with threecore and thirteen Gallies, charged with Foot-men; and (blaming the sloath of Nicias) he invaded the Syracusians the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste than he had good speed, being shamefully beaten and repulst with great loss. Hereupon Demosthenes and Eurymedon, determine to rise up from before Syracuse, and return to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good Intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Town could not long hold out.

Whatsoever Nicias his Intelligence was, upon the arrival of a new supply into the Town, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moon, boding (as was thought) ill success, caused them to defer their departure. But this superstition cost them dear. For the Syracusians, Lacedæmonians, and Corinthians, with threecore and seventeen fail of Gallies entred the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their Fleet, and whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians, in the same Port, encountered them with fourcore and six Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon; in which the Athenian Fleet was beaten by the lesser number, and Eurymedon slain. Now, though it were so, that the Syracusians received the more loss by Land (for the Fight was general) yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kind they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast down. For it was well said of Gylippus, to the Syracusians; When any People do find themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those Weapons in which they persuade themselves that they exceed all others, they not only lose their Reputation, but their Courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies sunk and wrackt, had seventeen taken and posselt by the Enemy: and with great labour and loss they defended the rest from being fired, having drawn them within a Palisade, in one corner of the Port, unadvisedly: for it is as contrary to a Sea-war, to thrust Ships into a freight room and corner, as it is to scatter Foot in a plain Field against Horse; the one subsisting, by being at large; the other, by close imbatalling.

The Syracusians having now weakened the Athenian Fleet, resolve to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile over, and there they came to Anchor; filling the Out-let with all manner of Vessels, which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracusan Fleet; which lay but single, because they were forced to range themselves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not only mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and laid behind them again certain Ships, which served in the former War for Victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were sunk, or the Chain which joyned them to their Fellows broken, the Athenians might yet find themselves a second time intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies which came on in form of a Wedge, to break through and force a passage, the Syracusians had left within these Gallies and Ships intangled together, a certain number of loose ones, to stop their courst and fury. For where the way of any Vessel using Oar or Sails is broken, and their speed fore-flowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were utterly lost, except with an invincible resolution, they could make their way, and break down this great Bridge of Boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolve to hazard, with all their Shipping (to the number of one hundred and ten of all sorts) and with all the strength of their Land-army, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the Bridge of Boats, did disorder the Athenian Fleet, ere they came to force the Bridge, as, albeit some few of them had broken through the Chains, yet being stoppt by the Ships without, and assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracusians, which were purposely left at large in the Sea, they were either taken or sunk. Three great disadvantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a freight, they had no room to turn themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the second, that having over-pestered their

their Gallies with Souldiers, who used offensive Arms of Darts and Slings, they had not place upon the Decks to stretch their arms; the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a passage, by which they might save themselves by running away. To be short, the Fight was no less terrible than the Confusion; the Slaughter great on all sides; and the Noise and the Cries so loud and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as survived, were beaten back to the Land, with loss of three-score of their Gallies, broken, sunk, or abandoned. The Syracusians did also lose twenty of theirs, with Pythion, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies running themselves into the bottom of the Port, saved themselves by the help and countenance of the Land-army, there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders go to Council. Demophilus persuades them to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracusians were triumphing, and made secure by their present Victory, to set upon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to return to Athen. This was no ill Council. For, as we have heard of many great Captains (yea, the greatest number of all that have been victorious) that have neglected the speedy prosecution of a beaten Enemy; so might we produce many examples of those, who, having slept securely in the bosom of good success, have been suddenly awaked by the re-called Companies of a broken Army, and have thereby lost again all the Honour and Advantage formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the advice of Demophilus: Others say, that the Sea-men were against it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all resolve to march over land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more favourable Fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, and other the Lacedaemonian and Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracusians to put themselves presently into the Field, and to stop all the passages leading to those Cities of their Enemies, to which the Athenians might make retreat. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cadex, lost us both the Indian Fleet, and the spoils of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates the Syracusan, finding it a lost labour, to persuade his Country-men to any hasty prosecution, devised this good stratagem, thereby to gain time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three Horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to find Nicias, and (after they had assured him, that they were of the Athenians Faction) to give him advice not to march away over hastily from the place wherein he was fortified; alleging that the Syracusians had lodged their Army, which could not long stay there upon the passages and places of advantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These Tidings Nicias easily believed, and put off his Journey to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearful than wise, and to them, every Thistle in the Field, appears by night, a man at arms.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their Baggage) they remove; being pierced and pursued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their Enemies Swords. The rest march away, to the number of forty thousand; and make their first passage by force, over the River of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their Enemies. But being every day charged in their marches, and by the Syracusan Horse-men, beaten in from foraging and provision of Food, they grow weak and heartless. The Syracusians also possess the Mountain Lepas, by which they were to pass towards Camarina, and thereby force them to fall back again towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could: being unable to proceed in their Journey intended. Many hard shifts they made in difficult passages and blind marches by night; which they were fain to endure, as having none other means to escape from the Enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continual skirmishing. To keep all in order, Nicias undertook the leading of the Vanguard; and Demophilus conducted the Rear. At the River Eranus, Nicias takes the start of a whole night's march, leaving Demophilus to make the Retreat: who being incompassed, and over-prest with numbers, in the end renders himself. The conditions he obtained, were far better than he could have hoped for; and the Faith of his Enemies far worse than he suspected. For he was afterwards, with Nicias, murdered in Prison. The Army of Demophilus being dissolved, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage: who being utterly broken upon the passage of the River Assinarum, rendered himself to Gylippus upon honest conditions. Gylippus fought to preserve him, and to have had the honour to have brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble Enemy to the Lacedaemonians, and who, at the Overthrow which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had saved the Lives of the vanquished; Demophilus, as one that had done to Lacedaemon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Army, dissuaded the rest, by all the art he had, from using any barbarous Violence, after so noble a Victory. But the cruel and cowardly sort, (Cowardice and Cruelty being inseparable Passions) prevailed, and caused these brave Captains to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starved in loathsome Prisons, and the rest sold for Slaves. This was the success of the Sicilian War, which took end at the River Assinarum, the four and twentieth day of May, in the four-score and eleventh Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicily, the Egeftans (for whose defence against the Selinuntines, this late War had been taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought help from the Carthaginians, to whom they offered themselves and their City as their Vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicily, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracusians, and their late Victories over the Athenians, they staid a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made unto them: for the Selinuntines were strictly allied to the Syracusians, as may appear by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolve upon the Enterprize; and (by a trick of their Punic Wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that City, as in the behalf of the Egeftans, to compel the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the Lands in question, as they of Syracuse should think meet to allow them. The Syracusians approved the motion, for it tended to their own Honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they took it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune in the Athenian War, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a business, that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would have it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace crave aid of Syracuse, and the Syracusan as ill grant it unto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrament, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hereupon an Army of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, under the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrown with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this Employment, that he might take revenge, as well of his Uncles, as of his Fathers Death, the one of them having been slain by the Himerans; the other by those of Selinus. Both these Cities, Himibal, in this War, won by force of Arms, sacked them and burnt them, and having taken three thousand of the Himerans Prisoners, he caused them to be led unto the place where Amilcar was slain, and buried them there.

After this, followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the Banishment of Hermocrates, who had lately been General of the Syracusan Forces against the Athenians. The malice of his Enemies had so far prevailed with the ingrateful Multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his near Vertue, at such time as he was aiding the Lacedaemonians in their War against Athens, wherein he did great service. All the honest for within Syracuse were sorry for the injury done unto him, and fought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himself returning into Sicily, gathered an Army of six thousand, with which he began to repair Selinus, and by many noble actions, laboured to win the love of his Citizens. But the Faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore he was advised to seize upon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his Friends within the Town, might have the better means to rise against the adverse Party. This he did: but presently the Multitude fell to Arms, and set upon him, in which Conflict he was slain. But his Son-in-law Dionysius, shall make them with Hermocrates alive again.

†. IV.

Of Dionysius the Tyrant: and others, following him in Syracuse.

THE Syracusans had enjoyed their Liberty about three score years, from the Death of Thrasybulus, to the Death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was raised up by God to take revenge, as well of their Cruelty towards Strangers, as of their Ingratitude towards their own best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their Pastime toward the Vertue of their worthiest Commanders with Death or Disgrace: which Custom they must now be taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the Principality of Syracuse, by the same degrees that many others before him had made themselves Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse itself. For being made Prætor, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians and other their Enemies, he behaved himself so well, that he got a general Love among the People and Men of War. Then began he to follow the Example of Pisistratus, that made himself Lord of Athens; obtaining a Band of six hundred men to defend his Person: under pretence, that his private Enemies, being traitorously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laid Plots how to murder him, because of his good services. He doubled the Pay of the Soldiers, alleging that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to assure them to himself. He persuaded the Citizens to call home out of exile, those that had been banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his devotion, as obliged unto him by so great a benefit. His first favour among the Syracusans, grew from his accusation of the principal men. It is the delight of base People to raise over their betters: wherefore, gladly did he help them to break down, as Fetters imprisoning their Liberty, the bars that held it under safe custody. Long it was not, ere the chief Citizens had found wherewith to avenge themselves. But what they saw, the People would not see: and some that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his help, were willing to help him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the City to smart. He began early to hunt after the Tyranny, being but five and twenty years of age when he obtained it: belike, it was his desire to reign long. His first work of making himself absolute Lord in Syracuse, was the possession of the Citadel; wherein was much good provision, and under it the Gallies were moored. This he obtained by allowance of the People; and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himself without all shame or fear: The Army, the chief Citizens restored by him from banishment; all the needy for within Syracuse that could not thrive by honest courses; and some neighbour-Towns bound unto him, either for his help in War; or for his establishing the Faction, reigning at that present; were wholly affected to his assistance. Having therefore gotten the Citadel into his hands, he needed no more, save to assure what he had already. He strengthened himself by divers marriages; taking first to Wife the Daughter of Hermocrates, and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionysius his Successor; the other, Arifomache, the Daughter of Hipparchus, and Sister to Dion, honourable men in Syracuse, which bare unto him many Children, that served to fortify him with new Alliances.

Yet it was not long ere some of the Syracusans (envying his prosperity) incited the Multitude, and took Arms against him, even in the novelty of his Rule. But their Enterprise was more passionately than wisely governed. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which as it vexed the Sicilian men at arms, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians waste all, that he might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them with a desire to free themselves from his Tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they found Friends to help them: there they forced his Palace, ransacked his Treasures, and so shamefully abused his Wife, that for the grief thereof she poisoned herself. But he followed their heels apace, and firing a Gate of the City by night, entered, strong enough to take revenge, by making a speedy riddance of them. For he spared none of his known, nor, not of his suspected Enemies. After that, he grew so doubtful of his Life, as he never durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, nor, so much as his Brother, to enter into his Chamber unfrisked and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the People that ever reigned in any

State;

State; and withal, the most unreflexively cruel.

After this, he separated with Fortification that part of the City, called the Island, from the rest; like as the Spaniards did the Citadel of Anwerp: therein he lodged his Treasures and his Guards.

He then began to make War upon the free Cities of Sicily: but while he lay before Herbelle, an inland Town, the Syracusans rebelled against him, so, as with great difficulty he recovered his Citadel: from whence, having allured the old Soldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the City with one thousand and two hundred Horse, he again recovered the Maffery over the Syracusans. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their Harvest, he disarmed all the Townsmen remaining, and new strengthened the Fort of the Island with a double Wall. He inclosed that part also called Eppole; which, with three score thousand Labourers, he finished in three weeks, being two Leagues in compass. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and forty thousand Targes, with as many Swords and Head-peeces, with fourteen thousand Corslets, and all other fitable Arms. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians (greatly enfeebled by the Plague) that except they would abandon the Greek Towns which they held in Sicily, he would make War upon them, and not staying for answer, he took the Spoil of all the Phœnician Ships and Merchant-dise within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our English before the War in our late Queens time. He then goes to the Field with four score thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, and sends his Brother Leptines to Sea with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred Ships of Burthen. Most of the Towns which held for Carthage yielded unto him, saving Panormus, Segesta or Egesta, Ancyræ, Motya, and Entella. Of these he first won Motya by assault, and put all therein to the Sword; but before Egesta he lost a great part of his Army by a Sally of the Citizens. In the mean while Himilco arrives, but ere he took Land, he lost in a Fight at Sea with Leptines, fifty Ships of War, and five thousand Soldiers, besides many Ships of Burthen. This notwithstanding, he recovered again Motya upon his first descent.

From thence marching towards Messina, he took Lipara, and (soon after) Messina, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionysius greatly to doubt his Estate. He therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territory of the Leontines, by which he supposed that Himilco would pass toward Syracuse, and he himself took the Field again, with four and thirty thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had divided his Army into two parts, marching with the one half over land, and sending Mago with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines his Brother to encounter Mago. But Leptines was utterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twenty thousand of his men were slain, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell us: that one City should be able to furnish five hundred sail of Ships, and two hundred Gallies (for so many did Syracuse arm in this War) and more strange it is, that in a Battle at Sea, without any great Artillery, or Musquetry, twenty thousand should be slain in one Fight. In all our Fights against the Turks, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, we hear of no such number lost; nor in any other Fight by Sea, that ever happened in our Age, nor before us. When Charles the fifth went to besiege Algier, he had in all his Fleet, Transports and others, but two hundred and fifty sail of Ships, and three score and five Gallies: for the furnishing of which Fleet, he sought help from all the Cities and Ports of Spain, Naples, and the rest of Italy. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the Field upon extremity, as many as were needful, of all that could bear Arms, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our days it is not so, neither indeed is it often requisite. Upon this overthrow Dionysius posits away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco follows him, and besieges the Town by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant having received aid from the Lacedaemonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himself to Sea, to make provision for his Citizens: who, in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sink four. Hereupon, finding their own success prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill, having also at the present Weapons in their hands; they confult how to recover their Liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedaemonian resisted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding advantage, that the Plague was so increased, and so violent among the Carthaginians, as it is said, that above an hundred thousand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the Power that he could gather together, sets upon them both by Sea and Land, and having slain great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire Peace. This Peace Dionysius fold him for a great sum of Money, on condition that he should settle away with his Carthaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no Faith was kept with him, for he was purified, and left many of his Carthaginians behind him. The rest of the Africans fell under the Swords of their Enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while bravely defended themselves, were (after their submission) entertained, and served the Conquerour.

Many such examples of perfidious dealing have I noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliver unto memory the like practices, when they meet with their matches: that which happened unto Monfieur de Piles, was very fitable to this Treachery, wherewith Dionysius purified Himilco. I was present when De Piles related the injury done unto him. He had rendered St. John d'Angelle, to the French King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. He rendered it upon promise made by the Faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safety, with all his Followers. Yet in presence of the King himself, of the Duke of Anjou his Brother, General of his Army, of the Queen Mother, and of divers Dukes and Marshals of France, he was set upon and broken in his March, spoiled of all that he had, and forced to save his Life by flight, leaving the most of his Soldiers dead upon the place: the Kings Hand and Faith, warranting him to march away with Ensigns displayed, and with all his Goods and Provisions, no whit availing him. It needs not therefore seem strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus break his Faith, since Kings, professing Christianity, are bold to do the like, or command their Captains to do it for them.

Dionysius, after this great Victory, took care to re-dedicate Messina. Mago, who staid in Sicily, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is again beaten by Dionysius, who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of four score thousand Soldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago: but they take

Eggs

Eggs for their Money, and make Peace with Dionysius, leaving the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves, whom Dionysius, after a long Siege, overcame, and gave their City to his mercenary Soldiers.

He then pass into Italy, obtained divers Victories there, brought the Rhegiens under their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourscore thousand Crowns, to furnish him with threefore Gallies, and to put in an hundred Pledges, for assurance of their future observance of Covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to perform unto them the Peace that they had so dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruin them utterly with the more ease. Now to the end he might not without some colour, falsifie the Faith that he had given to them; he pretended to want Victual for his Army, at such time as he seemed ready to depart out of Italy, and sent to them to furnish him therewith, promising to return them the like quantity, at his coming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refusal the cause of his Quarrel: if they yielded to aid him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of Food, to endure a Siege any long time against him. For to ruin them he had fully determined, at what price soever. And great reason he had to take revenge of them, if he had done it fairly, and without breach of Faith. For when, in the beginning of his Reign, he desired them to bestow a Daughter of some of their Nobility upon him for a Wife: they answered, That they had not any one fit for him, save the Hang-mans Daughter. Princes do rather pardon ill Deeds than villainous Words. Alexander the Great forgave many sharp Swords, but never any sharp Tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errors. And certainly, it belongs to those that have warrant from God, to reprehend Princes, and to none else, especially in publique.

It is said, that Henry the Fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his over-bold and biting Taunts that he used against him before Amiens; than for his Conspiracy with the Spaniards, or Savoyans: for he had pardoned ten thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawn their Swords against him. The contemptuous words that Sir John Perret used of our late Queen Elizabeth, were his ruine, and not the counterfeited Letter of the Romish Priest, produced against him. So feared it with some other, greater than he, that thereby ran the same, and a worse Fortune soon after.

To be short, he made them know new Bread from old. He assaulted their Town on all sides, which he continued to do eleven months, till he won it by force. He used his Victory without mercy; especially against Phylon, who had commanded within it.

Some other Wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and raising of this City, and those with variable success. For as in one Encounter he slew Atago, with ten thousand Africans: so the Son of Mago beat him, and slew his Brother Lepimus, with fourteen thousand of his Soldiers. After which he bought the Peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the advice of Prosperity and Adversity, as all Kings and States do.

When he had reigned eight and thirty years, he died: some say in his bed peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruel man he was, and a faithless; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterwards, for speaking against his Tyranny, he gave order to have him slain, or sold for a Slave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parafites therefore filled his Cruelty, The bate of evil men; and his lawless Slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his Justice. True it is, that Flatterers are a kind of Vermin, which poison all the Princes of the World, and yet they prosper better than the worst thief and valiantest men do: And I wonder not at it; for it is a World: and as our Saviour Christ hath told us, The World will love her own.

To this Dionysius, his Son of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdom and his Vices. To win the Love of the People, he pardoned, and released out of Prison, a great number of Persons, by his Father lockt up and condemned. Wistful, he remitted unto his Citizens divers Payments, by his Father imposed upon them. Which done, and thereby hoping that he had fastened unto himself the Peoples affections; he cast off the Sheeps Skin, and put on that of the Wolf. For, being jealous of his own Brethren, as men of more Vertue than himself, he caused them all to be slain, and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wives; Doro of Loerie, and Aristomacha a Syracusan, the Sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doro he had this Dionysius, who succeeded unto him: and by Aristomacha he had two Sons and two Daughters; of which the eldest, called Sophrosyne, he gave in Marriage to his eldest Son, Sophrosyne, he gave in Marriage to his eldest Son, and her half Brother Dionysius; the younger, called Arete, he bestowed on his Brother Theodoras: after whose Death, Dion took her to Wife, being his Niece.

This Dion, a just and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of Vertue, and that he was wholly given over to sensuality, and that he was much with Plato, whose Disciple he had been, as he drew him into Sicil to instruct the young King. And having persuaded the King to entertain him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius began to change condition, to change Tyranny into Monarchy, and to hold the Principality that he had, rather by the Love of his People, and his National Laws, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnes of his lasted not long. For Philybus the Hikorian, and other his Parafites, that hated Dion for severity, wrought him out of the Tyrants Favour, and caused him soon after to be banished out of Sicil, to the great grief of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels between him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great fear, or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fifty Gallies at his own charge, during the War against them: his Enemies found means, by sinister interpretation, to convert his good Will into matter of Treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations given of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to soften his mind, and to make him neglect his own Affairs, by the study of Philosophy; whilst Dion, in the mean time, having furnished fifty Gallies, under colour of the Kings service, had it in his own power, either to deliver to the Syracusan their former Liberty, or to make himself Lord and Sovereign of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberal offer which he made, to serve the King with so great a preparation at his own charge, begot him many Enemies. For they that had served the King for none other end, than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already been raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the fame offer that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But these covetous and ignorant Cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring that Dion had, were bold to fill his Love and Liberty, Pride and Presumption, and heartned the young King in his oppressing and eating up his own People, of whose spoils they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the Fifth had the repulse at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the bravest men that ever Spain brought forth, offered unto the Emperor to continue the Siege at his own charge. But he had never good day after it. For they that envied his Victories, and his Conquest of Mexico in the West Indies, persuaded the Emperor that Cortese sought to value himself above him, and to have it said, That what the Emperor could not, Cortese had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire than he that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented at first to send him the Revenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his Mobables at his own pleasure: not without giving hope to recall him in short time. Had he continued in this good mood, like enough it is, that Dion would have been well pleased to live well, as he did at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Post-fail of this Noble-mans Goods, and thereby urged him to take another course, even to seek the restitution of his Country to liberty. The Vertues of Dion, especially his great Liberty, had purchased much Love in Greece. This Love made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but it flood him in good stead, when he fought to raise men, with whose help he might return into Sicil. Yet he got not above eight hundred (for he carried the matter closely) to follow him in this adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needful, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil, marched to Syracuse, entered the City without resistance; armed the Multitude, and won all, save the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italy; but he quickly had advertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vain Treaties of Peace, and some forceable attempts to recover the Town, he was fain to depart; leaving yet the Castle to the custody of Apollocrates, his eldest Son. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philybus, coming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countries Liberty, had the fame reward that all worthy men have had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the City. He retireth himself to the Leontines; who receive him with great joy. Soon after his departure from Syracuse, new Troops enter the Castle: they fall out, assail, spoil and burn a great part of the City. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere he could arrive, Dionysius his Soldiers were retired; and the Townsmen thinking themselves secure, shut the Gates against Dion. But the next night, they of the Castle fall again with greater fury than ever; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Town. In this their extremity, Dion comes the second time to their succour; the love of his Country surmounting all the injuries that he had received. He sets upon the Garrison of the Castle with the one part of his Army; and quencheth the fire, every where kindled with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the Fire and the Sword, that had well near burnt to ashes and depopulated Syracuse, he recovered the Castle, with the Munition and Furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates after Dionysius his Father into Italy. But their malice, of whom he had been deceived, and whom he had loved most, gave an untime end to his days. For he was loon after this his Victory, murdered by Callippus; who, after he had, with ill success, a while governed Syracuse, was slain with the same Dagger, with which he had murdered Dion.

Ten years after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his Friends in Italy, recovers his Estate, and returns to Syracuse, driving Nysæus thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing more than ever, his cruelty, flee to Leontes, a Syracusan born, and then ruling the Leontines. Leontes enters into confederacy with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not only to prevail against Dionysius, but by the hatred of the Syracusans towards Dionysius, to have him also Lord of their City. The Syracusans being deservingly afflicted on all sides, lend to the Carthaginians for succour. Leontes also lends thither, and diffwades the Carthaginians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the business. He tells them by his Messengers, that he had entered into League with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Carthage to land any Army in Sicil. But the Carthaginians, being by this Treason of Leontes, more enraged than diffwaded, sent Timoleon with nineteen Gallies to deliver Syracuse from tyranny. In the mean while, Leontes had entered Syracuse, and with the help of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysius into the Castle, wherein he besieged him.

Leontes, being himself a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his Power, than how to deliver his Country. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to persuade him to return his Fleet, for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the fame Port of Rhegium; whose Captains advised Timoleon to get him gone in peace. They had far more Gallies there than he had, and were like to compel him, if he would not be persuaded. Timoleon finding himself over-mattered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captains, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the People, to deliver unto him those arguments for his return, which they had used to him in private; that he might, by publique testimony, discharge himself to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians perfwading themselves, that a Victory obtained by a few fair words, was without loss, and far more easie than that of many blows and wounds, yielded to Timoleon desire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegiens, stole out of the Press; and having set sail before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched towards Adranum, where pursuing Ietes his Army, he flew a part thereof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of Victory to beget friends. The Adranians joyined with him, and so did Mamercus the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands: as thinking it better to yield up himself, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Ietes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fifty days after his arrival, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Cerimb, to live there a private man, was still invaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Ietes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vain) the Murder of Timoleon.

Leontes

The Corinthians send unto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred Horse, which are slain in Italy by foul weather. Ietes is strengthened with threecore thousand Africans, brought unto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fifty Gallies to keep the Port. This was the first time that ever the Carthaginians had dominion within the Walls of that City. With this great Army, Ietes assaulted the Castle. Timoleon sends them Victuals and succour in small Boats by night from Catana. Mago and Ietes do therefore resolve to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leas, Captain of the Corinthians, filled out of the Castle, and took that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the mean while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marched towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Ietes, being frightened out of Sicily (which he might easily have conquered) with an idle rumour of Treason. This made him return to Carthage, where the general exclamation against his Cowardize, did so much affright him, that for fear of farther punishment, he hanged himself. Timoleon enters the City, and beats down the Castle (which he called the Nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the City, when the Strangers were fled, in effect desolate, so as their Houses did feed on the Grass growing in the Market-place. Therefore he writes to Cerimb for People to re-inhabit it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italy, others from other parts of the Island.

But a new form ariseth. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybæum, with threecore and ten thousand Souldiers transported (with all their Provision) in a thousand Ships of Burthen, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Army upon the passage of a River.

A Tempest of Rain, Hail, and Lightning, with boisterous Winds beating upon the Faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken: ten thousand slain, five thousand taken, with all their Carriages and Provisions: among which, there were found a thousand Corbels, guilt and graven. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Ietes, and following his Victory, took him, with his Son Euplemes, and the General of his Horse, Prisoners, whom he caused all to be slain: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he suffered Ietes his Wives and Daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God upon Ietes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arcte, Dion's Wife, and a young Child of his, which Asdrubal his Sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He again prevailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana to self. Mamercus fled to Hippon, Tyrant of Messina: but Timoleon pursuing him, won the Town, delivering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicily.

Finally, he made Peace with the Carthaginians; on condition, That they should not pass the River of Lycus. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syracusians, till his Death, and was solemnly buried by them in the Market-place of their City: the day of his Funerals being for ever ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time as Timoleon had delivered Syracuse from the Tyranny of Dionysius, and brought Peace to the whole Island, the Inhabitants enjoyed their Liberty in peace about twenty years. The Cities and Temples were repaired, the Trade renewed, the Merchant sailed in safety, and the labouring Man enjoyed the fruits of the Earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to govern, nor how to obey, which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings to govern them, should any long time subsist.

Twenty years after the death of Timoleon, there started up an Agathocles among them, a man of base Birth, and of base Condition; who from a Beggar to a common Souldier, from a Souldier to a Captain, and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prætor; finally, became Lord and Sovereign of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he ran, and underwent as many dangers ere he obtained the Principality. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banished. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable service, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their Wars against those of Enna and the Campanes, he did them memorable service: and on the contrary, as memorable service for the Margantians, against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the People of Margantia, and made General of their Forces, he sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so sorely, that the Citizens were driven to crave aid, even from their ancient and natural Enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians to relieve Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make Peace between himself and the Syracusians, binding himself by Promise and Oath, to remain a Friend and Servant to the Estate of Carthage for ever after. Amilcar entertained the business, and compounded the quarrels between Agathocles and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prætor, he entertains five thousand Africans, and divers old Souldiers of the Margantians, under colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poor and discontented Syracusians (the City being all divided into many Factions) he assails the Senators, kills all his Enemies and Opposites, divides the spoil of the Rich among the Poor, and gives liberty to his Souldiers to Rob, to Ravish, and to Murder, for two whole days and nights without controulment: the third day, when he had blunted their barbarous Appetites, and strewed the Streets with ten thousand dead Carcasses, besides those that had broken their Necks over the Walls, their Fury had no further subject to work on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the People (being an eloquent Knave) persuaded them, that for the violent Sicknes, by which the Common-wealth was utterly consumed, he found no better than the violent remedies which he had administered; and that he had affected no other thing, than the reducing of the State from an Oligarchy, or the Rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democracy, by which it had been governed, from the first institution, with so great glory and prosperity. This he did, to have the Crown clasp on his Head (as it were) perforce. For as he knew that he had left none living within the City fit nor able to exercise the Office of a Magistrate, so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted in the Murder and Spoil of their fellow Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawless Lord, who had been partaker with them in their Villanies and Cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: again and again, saluting, and adoring him by that Name, as if it had been given to him by some lawful Election. Hence had our King Richard the Third a piece of his pattern; but the one was of base, the other of Kingly Parents; the one took liberty from a Common-wealth, the other fought only to succeed in a Monarchy; the one continued his Cruelty to the end, the other, after he had obtained the Crown, fought, by making of good Laws, to recover the Love of his People.

The Life of this Tyrant is briefly written by Justin; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the sum whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him five thousand men to help in the Massacre of the Citizens, was also content to wink at many wrongs that he did unto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his Tyranny, and to let him vex and waste the whole Island, because it was thereby like to come to pass, that he should reduce all Sicily into such terms, as would make it become an easy Prey to Carthage. But when the Cities confederate with the Carthaginians sent their Embassadors with complaint of this ill dealing to Carthage; the Punic Faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better than mere falsehood) threw it self very honourable, in taking order for the redress. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in mind of his Covenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africa, and a new Captain appointed to succeed in his charge, with such Forces, as might compel Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would not hearken to it. All this tended to save his Confederates from suffering such injuries in their Confederates from suffering such injuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they took order to have it severely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutiny: the suffrages being given, but not calculated, and so reserved until he should return. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had some notice of it. In managing his business with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his own profit, as well as to the publick benefit of his Country. For he had made such a Composition with the Syracusians, as gave him not only means to weaken others, but to strengthen himself both in Power and Authority, even against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custom of those that hope to work their own ends by cunning practices; thinking to deal subtilly, and finally, they spin their Threads so small, that they are broken with the very Wind. Amilcar saw that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deal substantially, and that therefore it would be hard for him to make them follow his crooked devices: which if he could not do, it was to be expected, that their anger would break out into so much the greater extemery, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example which some of his foregoers had taught him; and for fear of such a death as the Judges might award him, he ended his own life in what sort he thought best. This depredation of Amilcar served to inform Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolved to get the start of them in action. He dissembled no longer, but instead of Spoil and Robbery, made open War upon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicily his own ere the Carthaginian Forces arrived: which thinking to have encountered an ill established Tyrant, found him ready, as a King, to defend his own, and give them their sharp entertainment. They were beaten by him, and their Navy was so Tempest-beaten, that they could neither do good by Land nor Sea, but were glad to leave their business undone, and return into Africa.

The Carthaginians prepare a new Fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furnished, was broken by foul weather, and the best part of their craft away, even whilst it was yet kenning of their City. But Amilcar, the Son of Gelo, gathering together the remainders of this Ship-wreck, was bold to pass over into Sicily, and landed not far from Gela: where Agathocles was soon ready to examine the cause of their coming. Many Skirmishes passed between them, in which (commonly) the Syracusian had the better. But his good success begat presumption; whereby he lost a Battle, more important than all the other Fights. One adverse chance is enough to overthrow the State of a Tyrant, if it be not upheld by great circumfession. The War was soon transferred to the Walls of Syracuse, within which Agathocles was closed up, and driven to make his last defence by their help, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great Massacre of the principal men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny, were (for the most part) such as had been either mercenary Souldiers, infranchised Slaves, or base and needy People; helpers in establishing the present Government, and Executioners of the Murders and Spoil committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well observed, and (withal) so fearful, that they durst not stir. But it was not enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their City; Famine was likely to grow upon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessity Agathocles adventured upon a strange course, which the event commended as wise. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet in those Vessels that rode in the Haven; and committing the Government of the City to his Brother Antander, willed the People to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) he had bethought himself of a mean, both to raise the Siege, and to repair all other losses. A Carthaginian Fleet lay in the Mouth of the Haven, both to hinder the entrance of Victuals, and to keep the besieged from issuing forth.

Now at such time as Agathocles was ready to depart, advertisement came that many Ships of Burthen laden with Corn and other Provisions, were drawing near unto Syracuse. To intercept these, the Carthaginians hoist sail, and launch forth into the deep. They were not far gone when they might behold Agathocles issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to give Conveyance unto his Victuals. Hereupon they wheel about, and make amain towards him, as thinking him the better booty. He neither abode their coming, nor fled back into the City, but made all speed towards Africk, and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as day would give them light. In the mean season the Vitallers were gotten into Syracuse, which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had unburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admiral perceived; first, that by pursuing two Fleets at once, he had mislead of them both; and secondly, that Agathocles returned not again, but was gone to seek his Fortune elsewhere; he thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend to well upon them, that they should not have leisure to do mischief in some other part.

The Carthaginian Navy followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and overtook him after six days. He had (at the first) a great start of them, so that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselves in seeking their own misfortune. For he fought with them, and beat them, and having sunk or taken many, drove the rest to fly which way they could, laden with strange tidings of his Voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discover unto them his project; letting them understand, that there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Ills of Sicily, than by bringing the War to their own doors. For here (said he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take arms against them, as soon as they perceive that there is an Army on foot, which dares to look upon their Walls. Their Towns are ill fortified, their People untrained and unexperienced in dangers; the mercenary Forces that they levy in these parts, will rather follow us than them, if we offer greater Wages than they can give: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them have some share with us in all the Wealth of the Carthaginians, than our Enemies can do, by making some addition to their Spoils. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk, and with many brave words encouraged his men to well, that they were contented to set fire on all their Ships (reserving one or two to use as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remain, save only in Victory. In this heat of resolution, they win by force two Cities, which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground, as a mark of terror to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians hearing this, are amazed, thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Army destroyed in Sicily. This impression so diffuses them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had escaped in the late Sea-fight, yet still they fear, and know not what. They suspect Amilcar's Faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principal Citizens at home of a meaning to betray Carthage unto the Enemy; they raise a great Army, and know not unto whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captains in the City, Hanno, and Bomilear; great Enemies, and therefore the more unlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made generals of the Army levied, which far exceeded the Forces of Agathocles. But it seldom happens, that diffention between Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Necessary drove Agathocles to fight, and the courage of his men resolved to deal with the whole Multitude of the Carthaginians, made ease the Victory against the one half of them. For Bomilear would not stir: but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this Victory brought over a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian Society, to take part with Agathocles, who pursuing his Victory, wins many Towns, and sends word to Syracuse of his good success. The Carthaginians also send into Sicily, willing Amilcar their General, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to be lost, whilst he was travelling in the Conquest of Sicily. Amilcar sends them five thousand men: all his Forces he thought it not needful to transport, as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicily, than to be drawn home by one that could scarce retain his own Kingdom. But these good hopes had a bad issue. He spent some time in winning a few Towns that adhered unto the Syracusan: and having brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surprise. It was a pretty (though tragical) accident, if it were true, as Tully relates it. Amilcar had a Dream, which told him that he should sup the next day within Syracuse. His Fancy begot this Dream, and he believed it. He made more haste than good speed toward the City: and coming upon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his Enemies were prepared for him, and had laid an Ambush to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried Prisoner into the City, in which it was likely that he had no great Cheer to his Supper: for they struck off his Head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome Present) to Agathocles.

This good success of things at home, did put quick courage into the Sicilian Army, that Agathocles was bold to wear a Crown, and stile himself King of Africk. He had allured Opbellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliver the Country into his hands: for that (as he said) it was sufficient unto himself to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicily, wherein (after this War ended) he might reign quietly. Opbellas came with a great Army, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous Sicilian taking advantage, did murder this his Affiliant: and afterwards, by good Words, and great Promises, drew all the Cyrenian Army to follow him in his Wars. Thus his Villainy found good success, and he so prevailed in Africk, that he got leisure to make a step into Sicily. Many Towns in Sicily had embraced a desire of recovering their Liberty, thinking it high time to fight at length for their own Freedom, after that they had so long been exposed (as a reward of Victory) either unto Aliens, or to Tyrants of their own Country. These had prevailed far, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high Spirits, and his good success in many Fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of Sicily he returned into Africk, where his Affairs stood in very bad terms. Archagathus his Son had lost a Battle, and (which was worse) had ill means to help himself, his Army being in mutiny for lack of Pay. But Agathocles pacified the Tumult, by the accustomed Promises of great Booty and Spoil. It had now been time for him to offer Peace to the Carthaginians, which to obtain, they would (questionless) have given to him both Money enough to pay his Army, and all that they then held in Sicily. For their City had been distressed, not only by this War, but by the Treason of Bomilear, who failed not much of making himself Tyrant over them. But Ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed upon the Conquest of Carthage it self: out of which dream he was awaked, by the loss of a Battle, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this War, had renewed their old Sacrifices of Children to Saturn, from which they had abstained ever since they made Peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their Prisoners taken in the Battle, to offer unto the said Idol, in way of thankfulness for their Victory. The Fire with which these unhappy men were consumed, caught hold upon the Lodgings neare unto the Altar, and spreading it self farther through the Camp, with the destruction of many men, caused such a Tumult as is usual in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Pavilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them believing that the noise in the adverse Camp, was a sign of the Enemies coming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a late retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new Calamity. In the beginning of this his Flight in the dark, he met with his own African Soldiers, and thinking them to be Enemies (as indeed the one half of them had revolted from him to the Carthaginians, in the last Battle) he began to assail them, and was so stoutly resisted, that he lost in this blind Fight, above four thousand of his men. This did discourage his proud Heart, that being fallen from the near hope of taking the City of Carthage, unto some distrust of his present weak fears, than lately he had known how to govern his Ambition. Therefore he took the way that came next into his Head; which was, to steal closely aboard his Ships with his younger Son (the elder he suspected of Inceft, and of Ambition) and so to fly into Sicily; thinking it the best course to shift for himself, as wanting Vessels wherein to transport his Army. His elder Son Archagathus perceiving his drift, arrested him, and put him under custody; but by means of a sudden Tumult, he was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his Sons behind him, his Flight being noised through the Army, all was in uproar, and extremity of rage caused not only the common Soldiers, but even such as had been Friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold upon his two Sons and kill them. That this Flight of Agathocles was extremely base; I need not use words to prove: That his fear was truly, as all fear is said to be, a passion, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the sequel doth manifest. His forsaken Soldiers being now a headless Company, and no longer an Army to be feared, obtained nevertheless a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places whereof they had possession, for nineteen Talents. Likewise Agathocles himself, having lost his Army, did nevertheless, by the reputation of this late War, make Peace with Carthage upon equal terms.

After this, the Tyrant being delivered from forraign Enemies, discovered his bloody Nature in most abominable Cruelties among the Sicilians. His Wans and his Fears urged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the Spoils of the Rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beauly rage, depopulated whole Cities. He devised new Engines of Torment; wherein striving to exceed the Bill of Phalaris, he made a Frame of Brass, that should serve to scorch men's Bodies, and wishal give him leave to behold them in their misery. So devilish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a Slave to his brutish Affections. In these mischiefs he was so outrageous, that he neither spared Sex nor Age; especially when he was informed of the Slaughter of his Children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserve his Estate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Country, took arms against him, and drove him into such fear, that he was fain to seek the Love at Carthage, which by ruling well, he might have had in Sicily. He freely delivered into the Phenician hands, all those Towns of the Phenicians in Sicily, belonging unto them, which were in his possession. They requited him honourably with great store of Corn, and with four hundred Talents of Gold and Silver. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed against the Rebels, and settled his Estate. Having no further business left in Sicily, he made a Voyage into Italy. There he subdued the Bruttians, rather by terror of his Name, than by any force, for they yielded at his first coming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lepara, and made the Inhabitants buy Peace with one hundred Talents of Gold. But when he had gotten this great Sum, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoil the Temples of their Gods. Herein (methinks) he did well enough. For how could he believe those to be Gods, that had continually given deaf ears to his horrible Perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleven Ships laden with Gold: all which, and all the rest of his Fleet, were cast away by foul weather at Sea; one Gally excepted, in which he himself escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grievous Sicknes fell upon him, that rotted his whole Body, spreading it self through all his Veins and Sinews. Whilst he lay in this case, all desiring his end, save only Theogenia (a Wife that he had taken out of Aegypt) and her small Children: his Nephew, the Son of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger Son of his own, began to contend about the Kingdom. Neither did they seek to end the Controversie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laid wait for the others Life, wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slew his Uncle, and got his Grand-fathers Kingdom without asking any leave. These Tidings wounded the Heart of Agathocles, with fear and sorrow. He saw himself without help like to become a Prey to his ungracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no favour was to be expected, either by himself, or by those whom only he now held dear, which were Theogenia and her Children. Therefore he advised her and them to fly before they were surprised: for that otherwise they could by no means avoid, either Death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gave them all his Treasures and Goods, wherewith he even compelled them (weeping to leave him desolate in so wretched a case) to embark themselves hastily, and make speed unto Aegypt. After their departure, whether he threw himself into the fire, or whether his Disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his Life as basely, as assuredly, and in as much want as he first began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamermires his Soldiers traitorously occupied Messana, and infected a great part of the Island. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicily. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot find. Likely it is, that he quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driven to fend for Pyrrhus to help them, who had married with a Daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soon weary of the Country (as hath been shewed before) and therefore left it; prophesying that it would become a goodly Champaign Field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiority. In which business, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our Story will declare.

§. V.

A re-continuation of the Roman War in Sicily. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsook the Carthaginians, and made his Peace with Rome.

WHEN Appius Claudius, following the advantage of his Victory gotten at Messana, brought the War unto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great City; Hieron found it high time for him to seek Peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himself by what means he could, when they were not in case to give him assistance; and foreseeing withal, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to fit still, without fear of molestation, whilst Rome and Carthage were fighting for the Mastery. In this good mood, the new Roman Consuls, M. Valerius, and C. Octavius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his Friendship. Yet they made use of their present advantage, and sold him Peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Army into Sicily; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring over Hieron to their side. If the Syracusan held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the sum of Money imposed upon him, and by their performing none other piece of Service) all the whole time of their abode in the Island; then was his departure from the Friendship of Carthage, no less to his Honour, than it was to his Commodity. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his own Kingdom to run into manifest peril of subversion for their sakes, that should have received all the profit of the Victory: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without training themselves to give him relief. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proof of the strength of Syracuse in the days of Agathocles: and therefore knew that it was able to bear out a very long Siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack in sending help: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their own work might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the Besieged City was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason to try the utmost hazard of War against the Carthaginians, who fought no other thing than to bring it into Slavery: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient, if they could withdraw it from the Party of their Enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hieron. The former of these cared not what the Citizens endured, so long as he might preserve his own Tyranny: the latter, as a just and good Prince, had no greater desire than to win the Love of his People, by seeking their Commodity; but including his own Felicity within the publique, laboured to uphold both, by honest and faithful dealing. Hereby it came to pass that he enjoyed a long and happy Reign; living dear to his own Subjects, beloved of the Romans; and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians: whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himself, ere he left their Society, made unwilling to seek his Ruine; or their more earnest business with the Romans, made unable to compass it.

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and win Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintain a Fleet. Their first loss, and first Victory by Sea. Of Sea-fight in general.

Hieron having sided himself with the Romans, aided them with Victuals and other Necessaries: so that they presuming upon his assistance, recall some part of their Forces. The Carthaginians find it high time to better them; they lend to the Ligurians, and to the Troops they had in Spain, to come to their aid; who being arrived, they made the City of Agrigentum, the Seat of the War against the Romans, filling it with all manner of Munition.

The Roman Consuls having made Peace with Hieron, return into Italy; and in their places, Lucius Posthumus, and Quintus Mamilius, arrive. They go on towards Agrigentum: and finding no Enemy in the Field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fifty thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of Harvest being come, a part of the Roman Army range the Country to gather Corn, and those at the Siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians fall furiously, and in danger the Roman Army, but are in the end repelled into the Town with great loss; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assaults redoubled their Guards, and the Besieged kept within their Cover. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deep Trench between the Walls of the City and their Camp, and another on the outside thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any quarter suddenly, by a fall, nor those of the Country without, break upon them unawares: which double defence kept the Besieged also from the receiving any relief of Victuals and Munitions, whilst the Syracusan supplies the Assaults with what they want.

The besieged fend for succour to Carthage: after they had been in this fort pent up five months. The Carthaginians imbarc an Army, with certain Elephants, under the Command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heracles, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himself into the Field, and surpriseth Erbelus, a City, wherein the Romans had bestowed all their Provision. By means hereof, the Famine without grew to be as great as it was within Agrigentum: and the Roman Camp no less streightly affliged by Hanno, than the City was by the Romans: in such manner, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had been forced to abandon the Siege. But seeing that this distress was not enough to make them rich; Hanno determined to give them Battel. To which end departing from Heracles, he makes approach unto the Roman Camp. The Romans resolve to sustain him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian Horse-men to charge their Vanguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to return as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground. The Numidians perform it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno gives upon them, and having slaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

After this Encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two months, but lay strongly incamped, waiting until some opportunity should invite them. But Annibal, that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by Signs as Messengers, made Hanno know, how ill the extremity which he endured, was able to brook such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, provoked the Consuls to fight. But his Elephants being disordered by his own Vanguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day; and with such as escaped, he recovered Heracles in succour, perceiving this, and remaining hopeless of succour, resolved to make his own way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this Victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligently, with all the remainder of his Army, and paid by the Roman Camp without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vain: sure they were, that he could not carry the City with him, which with little ado the Romans entered, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this Victory, purpose henceforth rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this War, only to succour the Messanians, and to keep the Carthaginians from their own Coasts: but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicily; and from thence, being favoured with the wind of good success, to sail over into Africa. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and of private Men, to cover the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither have nor need, taking from us the true use and fruition of what we have already. This curse upon mortal men, was never taken from them since the beginning of the World to this day.

To prosecute this War, Lucius Valerius, and Titus Octavius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon the Romans being Masters of the Field, many inland Towns gave themselves unto them. On the contrary, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their own Coasts, often invaded by the African Fleets, as also to equal themselves in every kind of Warfare with their Enemies, determine to make a Fleet. And herein Fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in Shipwrights craft, a storm of wind thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five banks to the shore.

Now had the Romans a pattern, and by it they began to set up an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies rowed by five on every bank, and twenty, of three on a bank: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the Feat of Rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed upon the Sea-lands many Seats, in order of the Banks in Gallies, whereon they placed their Water-men, and taught them to bear the Sand with long Poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Matter, that so they might learn the stroke of the Gally, and how to mount and draw their Oars.

When their Fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed every year) was made Admiral: who being more in love with this new kind of Warfare, than well advised, paid over to Messana with seventeen Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There he staid not, but would needs row along the Coast to Lipara, hoping to do some piece of service. Hannibal, a Carthaginian, was at the same time Governour in Panormus; who being advertised of this new Sea-mans arrival, sent forth one Boades, a Senator of Carthage, with twenty Gallies, to entertain him. Boades falling upon the Consul unawares, took both him and the Fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good news, together with the Roman Gallies and their Consul; he grew no less foolishly hardy than Cornelius had been. For he, fancying to himself to surpris the rest of the Roman Fleet, on their own Coast, ere they were yet in all points provided; fought them out with a Fleet of fifty Sail: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his own behind him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twenty Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had lost but seventeen, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fifty.

The Romans being advertised of Cornelius his overthrow, make haste to redeem him, but give the Charge of their Fleet to his Colleague, Dulcius. Dulcius, considering that the Roman Vessels were heavy and slow, the African Gallies having the speed of them, devised a certain Engine in the Prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselves with their Enemies, when they were (as we call it) board and board, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the weightier Ships had gotten the advantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftness serve them, nor their Mariners craft; the Vessels wherein both Nations fought, being open, so that all was to be carried by the advantage of Weapon, and Valour of the Men. Besides this, as the heavier Gallies were likely to crush and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they, by reason of their breadth, more steady; and those that best kept their feet, could also best use their hands. The example may be given between one of the long Boats of his Majesties great Ships, and a London Barge.

Certainly, he that will happily perform a Fight at Sea, must be skilful in making choice of Vessels to fight in: he must man of War upon the Waters, belonging to a good man of War upon the Waters, than great daring; and must know, that there is a great deal of difference between fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Guns of a slow Ship pierce as well, and make as great holes as those in a swift. To clasp Ships together without con-consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of War: for by such an ignorant bravery was Peter Stroffe loft at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquis of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admiral of England, been loft in the year 1588. if he had not been better advised, than a great many malignant Fools were, that found fault with his Demeanour. The Spaniards had an Army aboard them; and he had none: they had more Ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that had he intangled himself with those great and powerful Vessels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the defences, are equal to an hundred that board and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred for twenty of ours, to defend themselves withal. But our Admiral knew his advantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held his Head. Here to speak in general of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for private hands than for the Press) I say, That a Fleet of twenty Ships, all good Sailers and good Ships, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good Ships, and of lower sailing. For if the Fleet of an hundred fail keep themselves near together in a gross Squadron, the twenty Ships charging them upon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall back upon their next Fellows: of which, so many as intangle, are made unrelievable or loft. Force them they may easily, because the twenty Ships which give themselves scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillery, by clapping into the Wind, and flying, they may give them the other: and so the twenty Ships batter them in pieces with a perpetual Volley, whereas those that fight in a Troup have no room to turn, and can always fly but one and the same beaten side. If the Fleet of an hundred fail give themselves any distance, then shall the lesser Fleet prevail, either against those that are a-rear and hindmost, or against those, that by advantage of over-falling their Fellows keep the wind: and if upon a Lee-shore, the Ships next the wind be constrained to fall back into their own Squadron, then it is all to nothing, that the whole Fleet must suffer Shipwreck, or render it self. That such advantage may be taken upon a Fleet of unequal speed, it hath been well enough conceived in old time; as by that Oration of Heracles, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be observed.

Of the Art of War by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Harry, Prince of Wales; a Subject, to my knowledge, never handled by any man, ancient or modern: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his loss; by the loss of that brave Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sun, we shall find the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equal words and forrows; I will therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura locus leguatur, ingentes supert.

But it is now time to return to the beaten Carthaginians, who by losing their advantage of Swift Boats, and boarding the Romans, have lost fifty fail of their Gallies: as on the other side, their Enemies, by commanding the Seas, have gotten liberty to sail about the West part of Sicily; where they raised the Siege laid unto Segesta by the Carthaginians, and won the Town of Mazæa, with some other places.

§. VII.

Divers Enterprizes of War, between the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable success. The Romans prepare to invade Africa: and obtain a great Victory at Sea.

THE Victory of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Naval Triumph that was ever seen in that City; so gave it unto the Romans a great encouragement to proceed in their Wars by Sea; whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicily, but all the other Isles between Italy and Africa, beginning with Sardinia, whither soon after they sent a Fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions that might help to recompence the late misfortune, and being advertised that some quarrel was grown between the Roman Souldiers and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incamp a-part, he sent forth Hanno to set upon them, who taking them unawares, buried four thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-war in Sicily, Hannibal, who had lately been beaten by Sea, but escaped unto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former error, obtained the trust of a new Fleet, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: the Conquest of which Island, the Romans had entertained for their next Enterprize. Now it so fell out, that the Romans crossing the Seas from Sicily, arrived in the Port where Hannibal lay with his new Fleet anchored. They set upon him unawares, and took the better part of the Fleet and which he conducted, himself hardly escaping the danger. But it little availed him to have escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with his second un-fortunate Voyage, that they hanged him up for his diligen- ce: (for as it hath been said of old) Nemo est hic in Bello peccare; in Via it is too much to find twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Confuls, till * Panormus was besieged: where, when the Romans had fought in vain to draw the Carthaginians into the Field; being unable to force that great City, because of the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they departed thence, and took certain in-land Towns, as Mylærum, Enna, Camæra, and others; between Panormus and Messana. The year following, C. Attilius the Consul, who commanded the Roman Fleet, discovered a Company of the Carthaginian

* If we may credit Antiquity, which is not to be doubted, the Carthaginians were wont to have five ranks of Oars one over another; and the other Gallies (rarely) fewer. But had this been so, they must have had five Decks, each over other: which hath seldom been seen in Ships of a thousand Tons: neither could the third, fourth, and fifth ranks, have reached unto the Water with their Oars.

Chap. I.

Gallies, ranging the Coast, and not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the halfe he made, and loft all, save the Gally which transported him: wherewith himself escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Attilius his Fleet was gotten up: who renewing the Fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which, the Victory remaining doubtful, both challenge it. Now to try at once which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a Fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies, the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fifty, * Tirremes, Quadrirèmes, and Quinquirèmes.

* The Quadrirème was a Gallie, wherein every Oar had five men to draw it; the Quadrirème had four in an Oar; and the Tirremes three. Some have thought that the Quadrirème had five ranks of Oars one over another; and the other Gallies (rarely) fewer. But had this been so, they must have had five Decks, each over other: which hath seldom been seen in Ships of a thousand Tons: neither could the third, fourth, and fifth ranks, have reached unto the Water with their Oars.

The Romans resolve to transport the War into Africa; the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the Coast of Sicily. The numbers, with which each of them filled their Fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that ever fought on the Waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred Rowers to every Gally, one with the other. The Roman Fleet was divided into four parts, of which the three first made the form of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first Squadrons making the Flanks, and the third Squadron, the Base: the point thereof (wherein were the two Confuls as Admirals) looking toward the Enemy, and the middle space lying empty. Their Vessels of carriage were towed by the third Squadron. After all came up, the fourth, in form of a Crescent, very well manned, but exceeding thin: so that the Horns of it inclosed all the third Squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian Fleet, I cannot conceive by the relation; but, by the manner of the Fight afterwards, I conjecture that the Front of their Fleet was thin, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en bari; a long Front of Horle, and thin; which form, since the Pilots prevailed over the Lance, they have changed. Behind this first outstretch- ed Front, their Battalions were more folled. For Amilcar, Admiral of the Carthaginians, had thus ordered most of purpose (his Gallies having the speed of the Romans) that when the first Fleet of the Romans halted to break through the first Gallies, they should all turn tail, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a Victory) disorder themselves, and for eagerness of taking the Run-aways, leave their other three Squadrons far behind them. For so must it needs fall out, seeing that the third Squadron towed their Horle-boats, and Victual- lers; and the fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcar's direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken the thin Front of the Carthaginian first Fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gave after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behind them for the second Squadron. Herby the Romans were drawn near unto the Body of the Carthaginian Fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (as the first) received great loss, till their second Squadron came up, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oars. Hanno also, who commanded the right Wing of the Carthaginian Fleet invaded the Roman Rearward, and prevailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcellus Attilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heels; as not able to sustain both Squadrons. The Rear being relieved, the Confuls came to the aid of their third Battalion, which towed their Victuals, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: but the Confuls joining their Squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part also to running. This Victory fell to the Romans, partly by the hardiness of their Souldiers, but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could never after joynt himself to any of his other Squadrons, that remained as yet in fair likelihood of prevailing, so long as they fought upon even terms, and but Squadron to Squadron. But Amilcar forsaking the Fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman Fleet unengaged, and ready to give succour to any of the other parts that were oppressed. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they lost but four and twenty of theirs; whereas the Africans loft thirty that were sunk, and three score and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also divided his Fleet into four Squadrons (besides those that he ranged in the Front, to draw on the Enemies, and to engage them) and that, while he himself fought with one Squadron that charged him, all the rest of the Enemies Fleet had been at the same time entertained, he had prevailed: But the second Squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppressed: and Amilcar being oppressed and scattered, the Confuls had good leisure to relieve both their third and fourth Squadron, and to get the Victory.

Charles the Fifth, among other his Precepts to Philip the Second his Son, where he advieth him concerning War against the Turks, tells him, that in all Battels between them and the Christians, he should never fail to charge the Janssars in the beginning of the Fight, and to engage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Janssars, who are always reserved in the Rear of the Battel, and in whom the Turk reposest his greatest confidence; come up in a gross Body, when all the Troups on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carry the Victory before them without resistance. By the same order of fight and reservation, did the Romans also prevail against other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in store (who were the choice of their Army) for the up-shot and last blow. A great and a victorious advantage it hath ever been found, to keep some one or two good Troups to look on, when all else are disbanded and engaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans prevail in Africa. Attilius the Consul propounds intolerable Conditions of Peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made Prisoner.

NOW the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their Fleet, set sail for Africa, and arrived at the Promontory of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some forty leagues from Heracles in Sicily, where Amilcar himself as yet staid. From this Head-

Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East side of the Promontory, till they came to Clypea, a Town about fifty English mile from it. There they disembarked, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which to ease them of labour, was yielded unto them. Now had they a Port of their own on Africa side; without which, all Invasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their own Carthage, fearing that the Roman Fleet and Army had directed themselves thither; but being advertised that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all forts both by Sea and Land for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the mean while wait all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, that one of the Consuls should remain with the Army, and that the other should return with the Fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Manlius the Consul is sent home to Rome, whither he carried with him twenty thousand African Captives, with all the Roman Fleet and Army: except forty Ships, fifteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse that were left with Attilius.

With these Forces, Regulus easily won some Towns and Places that were unwall'd, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter before he came unto Adu. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that near unto the River of Begrada, he encountered with a Serpent of one hundred, and twenty foot long, which he slew, not without loss of many Souldiers, being driven to use against it such Engines of War as served properly for the assaulting of Towns. At Adu he met with the Carthaginian Army, whereof the Captains were Hanno and Bostar, together with Amilcar, who had brought over out of Sicily five thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse to succour his Country. These (belike) had an intent, rather to weary him out of Africa, by weary protraction of time, than to undergo the hazard of a main Fight. They were careful to hold themselves free from necessity of coming to blows: yet had they a great desire to save the Town of Adu out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their general purpose, and yet to disturb him in the Siege of Adu, they incamp near unto him, and strongly (as they think) on the top of an Hill; but thereby they lose the services, both of their Elephants, and of their Horsemen. This disadvantage of theirs Regulus discovers, and makes use of it. He assails them in their strength, which they defend a while; but in fine, the Romans prevail, and force them from the place, taking the spoil of their Camp. Following this their good Fortune at the heels, they proceed to by Charles the Fifth, in the year 1536. and was one of the three Keys which he gave in charge to Philip the second his Son to keep safe; to wit, this Town, the Key of Africa; the Key of the Netherlands, and Cadix, the Key of Spain. But two of these Philip lost, that he never found them again; the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queen Elizabeth, to wresting out of his hands: where we failed not to pick any Lock, but break open the Doors, and having rifled all, threw it into the Fire.

By the loss of this Battle at Adu, and more especially by the loss of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismay'd. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult upon their Misfortunes; invade and spoil their Territory, and force those that inhabit abroad to forsake their Villages and Fields, and to hide themselves within the Walls of Carthage. By reason hereof a great Famine at hand threatens the Citizens.

Attilius finds his own advantage, and assures himself that the City could not long hold out: yet he feared left it might defend it self until his time of Office, that was near expired, should be quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reap the Honour of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it self, persuades him to treat of Peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded unto them no unworthy and safe conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with fear, became now so courageous and disdainful, that they refused, either to defend their Liberty, or to die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great Troop of Greeks, whom they had formerly sent to entertain. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xanthippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received near unto Adu, gave it out publicly, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ran till it came to the Senate; Xanthippus is sent for, gives the reason of his Opinion, and in conclusion, being made General of the African Forces, he puts himself into the Field. The Army which he led, consisted of no more than twelve thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the Forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Liberty, Lives, Goods, Wives and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were mis-numbered; the one consisting of an hundred and forty thousand, the other of an hundred and fifty thousand: were it not commonly found, that they which use the service of mercenary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their own Doors.

Xanthippus, taking the Field with this Army, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his Troops upon fair and level ground, fitted both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them Battle. The Romans wonder whence this new Courage of their Enemies might grow: but confident they were that it should be soon abated. Their chief care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a form Hope; that these might, either with Darts and other casting Weapons, drive back the Beasts upon the Enemies, or at least break their Violence, and hinder them from rushing freely upon the Legions. To the same end they made their Barrels deeper in file than they had been accustomed to do. By which means, as they were the less subject unto the impression of the Elephants; so were they the more exposed unto the violence of Horse, where-in the Enemy did far exceed them. The Elephants were placed by Xanthippus, all in one rank, before his Army, which followed them at a reasonable distance: his Horse-men, and some light-armed Foot of the Carthaginian Auxiliaries, were in the Wings. The first Order was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so unable to make resistance, that they break into the Battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battle was helpful. For when the Beasts had spent their force in piercing through a few of the first Ranks, the Squadrons nevertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian Horse, having at the first Encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Attilius out of the Field, began to charge the Roman Battalions in Flank, and put them in great distress; distress; who being forced to turn face every way, could neither pass forward, nor yet retire; but had much ado to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the mean while, such of the Romans as had escaped the fury of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell upon the Carthaginian Army, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered company, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared to have dealt with the Enemy upon equal terms. Here was therefore a great slaughter with little fight; the Romans hastily recoiling to the body of their Army, which being surrounded with the Enemy, and spent with travel, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these Troops, that open the way to a general overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full Victory, destroying the whole Roman Army, save two thousand, and taking five hundred Prisoners, together with Attilius the Consul. Of their own they lost no more than eight hundred Mercenaries, which were slain when the Fight began, by two thousand of the Romans, that wheeling about, to avoid the Elephants, bare down all before them, and made way even to the Carthaginian Trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Army behind them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slain. Hereby Fortune made the Romans know, that they were no less her Vassals, than were the Carthaginians: how insolentsoever they had been in their propoition of Peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperity, which the never gave nor sold to any mortal man. With what joy these News were welcomed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily conjecture; and what great things the Virtue of one man hath often brought to pass in the World, there are many examples to prove, no less than this of Xanthippus: all of them confirming that Sentence of Eurypides, Mens una sapient, plurimum vincit manus; Many men bands equal not one wise mind.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xanthippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more envied than honoured, or for what other cause it is unknown.

The death of Attilius Regulus the Consul, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransom of Prisoners on both sides: giving his Faith to return, if the business were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw that his Country should lose by the bargain: so far was he from urging the Senate upon compassion of his own misery, that he earnestly persuaded to have the Prisoners in Africa left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where, for his pains taken, he was rewarded with an horrible Death. For this his Constancy and Faith, all Writers highly extol him. But the Carthaginians seem to have judged him an obstinate and malicious Enemy; that neither in his Prosperity would hearken to reason, nor yet in his Calamity would have the natural care to preserve himself and others, by yielding to such an office of humanity, as is common in all Wars (not grounded upon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoever the Carthaginians thought of him, sure it is, that his faithful observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave Speech which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of Prisoners, appears in all reason, to have proceeded from a vain-glorious forwardness, rather than from any necessity of State. For the exchange was made soon after his Death; wherein the Romans had the worst bargain, by so much as Regulus himself was worth. As for the Authority of all Historians that magnify him in this point, we are to consider that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extreme torments, could not be more grievous to him, than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither do I think that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein, otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romans had behaved to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinary practice to use others in the like sort. Cruelty doth not become more warlike sort, but rather more odious, by which almost may. It was the Roman fashion to whip almost to death, and then to behead year afterwards their Enemies whom they took, yet, although they were such as had always met with tyranny, that they should cry out against the like tyrannical insolence in others, as if it were lawful only in themselves.

The consideration, both of this misfortune, that rewarded the Pride of Attilius his intolerable Demands, and of the sudden Valour wherewith the Carthaginian fear was changed by mere desperation; calls to remembrance the like Insolency of others in prosperity, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath been denied. In such cases I never hold it impatient, to add unto one, more testimonies; approving the true rules, from which our passions carry us away.

In the year 1378, the Genovaises won so fast upon the Venetians, as they not only drove their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their own Fleet within two miles of Venice it self. This bred such an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered unto the Genovaises (their State reserved) whatsoever they would demand. But Petrus Doria, blown up with many former Victories, would hearken to no composition, save the yielding of their City and State to his discretion. Hereupon the Venetians being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining Power, and assailed Doria with such desperate fury, that they break his Fleet, kill Doria himself, take nineteen of his Gallies, fourscore Boats of Padoa, and four thousand Prisoners; recover Chioggia, and all the places taken from them; and following their Victory, enter the Port of Genua, enforcing the Genovaises basely to beg Peace, to their extreme dishonour and disadvantage, being beaten; which being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earl of Flanders, in the year 1380. when having taken a notable, and withal an over-cruel revenge upon the Gantois, his refused mercy to the rest, who in all humility, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their City, Goods, and Estates to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had unadvisedly refused, and was resolved to extinguish them utterly; they issue out of their City with five thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earl, break his Army, and entice him to wish his vanquished Followers, and entice him to wish himself under an heap of Straw in a poor hide cottage, out of which, with great difficulty he escaped, and saved himself. Such are the fruits of insolency.

How the Affairs of Carthage prospered after the Victory against Atilius: How the Romans having lost their Fleet by Tempest, resolve to forsake the Seas: The great advantages of a good Fleet in War, between Nations divided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late Victory, all places that had been lost in Africa, return to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clysæ stands out; before which the Carthaginians lie down, and assail it, but in vain: For the Romans hearing of the loss of Atilius went their Forces in Africa, and with all, that Clysæ was besieged, make ready a great Army, and transport it in a Fleet of three hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Amilins, and Sir. Fabius their Consuls. At the Promontory of Mercury, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies set out on purpose, upon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans took by force an hundred and fourteen of their Fleet, and drew them after them to Clysæ; where they staid no longer than to take in their own men that had been besieged: and this done, they made amain toward Sicily, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty Voyage they despise the advice of the Pilots, who pray them to find Harbour in time, for that the Season threatened some violent Storms; which ever hapned between the rings of Orion, and of the * Dog-star. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus forewarned them of the Weather at hand, and certified them withal, that the South Coast of Sicily had no good Ports, wherein to save themselves upon such an accident, yet this victorious Nation was perfwaded that the Wind and Seas feared them no less than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themselves. So refusing to stay within some Port, as they were advised, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their Reputation, after this Victory against the Carthaginian Fleet; to take a few worthless Towns upon the Coast. The merciless Winds in the mean while overtake them, and near unto Camerina, overturn and thrust headlong on the Rocks, all but fourscore of three hundred and forty Ships: so as their former great Victory was devoured by the Seas, before the Fame thereof recovered Rome.

* There is no part of the World which hath not some certain times of outrageous weather, besides their accidental storms. We have upon our Coast a Michaelmas Flaw, that seldom or never fails. In the West Indies, in the months of August and September, those most forcible Winds which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or North Winds, are very fearful: and therefore they that Navigate in those parts, take heed till those months be end. Charles the Fifth, being sail'd in passing the Seas toward Algiers, in the Winter quarter, contrary to the Council of A. Doris, as he was in like unseasonable times to continue his Siege before Mers in Larin, lost an hundred and forty Ships by Tempest, and fifteen Gallies, with all in effect in them, men, Victuals, Hories, and Munition: a loss no less great, than his retreat, both from before the one and the other, was extremum dishonourable.

The Carthaginians hearing what had hapned, repair all their warlike Vessels, hoping once again to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their Land-forces since the Overthrow of Atilius. They send Atraball into Sicily with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and forty Elephants, embarked in two hundred Gallies. With this Army and Fleet he arrives at Lilybæum; where he begins to vex the Parrissians of Rome. But adversity doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three months (a matter of great note) one hundred and twenty Ships; with which, and the remainder of their late Shipwrack, they row to Panormus, or Palermo, the chief City of the Africans in Sicily, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, return to Rome.

Very detestous the Romans were to be doing in Africa: to which purpose they employed C. Servilius, and C. Sennarius, their Consuls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoil they made up on the Coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their return, they were first set upon the Sands, and like to have perished near unto the lesser Syrtis, where they were fain to heave all over board, that so they might get off: then, having with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their passage from Panormus towards Lily, they lost an hundred and fifty of their Ships by foul weather. A greater discouragement never Nation had; the God of the Wars favoured them no more, than the God of the Waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enrich them with upon the Land, Neptune robbed them upon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, four hundred and fifty Ships and Gallies, with all the Munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perfwaded them to give over their Navigation, and their Fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-army into Sicily, under L. Cælius, and C. Furius, their Consuls. These they transported in three more score ordinary Passage-boats, by the Straights of Messina, that are not above a mile and a half broad from land to land. In like sort the Overthrow which Atilius received in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them less cholerick against the Carthaginians than before; so that for two years after they kept the high and woody grounds, not daring to fight in the fair and champion Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicily, without a Navy, much less to maintain the War in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send Forces from Messina to Egesta, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicily, making sometimes a march of above an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Army, and the provisions that follow it, in less than fourteen days, the Carthaginians would pass it with their Gallies, in eight and forty hours.

An old example we have of that great advantage of transporting Armies by water, between Carthage and Edmond Ironsides. For C. Cælius, when he had entred the Thames with his Navy and Army, and could not prevail against London, suddenly imbarcked; and sailing to the West, landed in Dorsetshire, so drawing Edmond and his Army thither. There finding ill entertainment, he again shippt his men, and entred the Severn, making Edmond to march after him to the succour of Worcester, by him greatly provoked. But when he had Edmond there, he failed back again to London: by means whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least help, which the Netherlands have had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their Liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could pass their Army from place to place unwaried and entire, with all the Munition and Artillery belonging unto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their Enemies have been able to do it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Captains, and of the worthiest

Princes,

Chap. I.

of the History of the World.

Princes, that either the present or proceeding Ages have brought forth, in the year 1590. carried his Army by Sea, with forty Cannons, to Breda: making countenance either to besiege Biffeldus, or Gertruiden-Berg; which the Enemy (in prevention) filled with Souldiers and Victuals. But as soon as the Wind served, he suddenly set sail, and arriving in the mouth of the Meuse, turned up the Rhine, and thence to Tiel, and fate down before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march over land round about Holland, above fourscore mile, and over many great Rivers with their Cannon and Carriage, Zutphen was taken. Again, when the Spanish Army had overcome this wearisome March, and were now far from home, the Prince Maurice making countenance to sail up the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and failing down the Stream, he was set down before Half in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Town he also took, before the Spanish Army could return. Lastly, the Spanish Army was no sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good Fleet, having fortified Half, fell sail again, and presented himself before Nymegen in Gelders, a City of notable importance, and maritred it.

And to say the truth, it is impossible for any maritime Country, not having the Coasts admirably fortified, to defend it self against a powerful Enemy that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second, had fully resolved to hinder Sir John Norris in the year 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugal, before the Gates of Lisbon; and that he would have kept off the English, by power of his Land-forces, as being too weak at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armada, by the Fleet of Queen Elizabeth, in the year foregoing. Surely, it had not been hard for him to prepare an Army, that should be able to resist our eleven thousand. But where should this Army have been bestowed? If about Lybourn, then would it have been ease unto the English, to take, ransack, and burn the Town of Grims, and to waste the Country round about it. For the great and threatening preparations, of the Earl of Alencara, the Marquels of Saralva, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hasty levy of eight thousand, under the Earl of Andrada, serve to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir John Norris and his Associates: considering that the English charged there at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behind which they lay, that was flanked with Shot, and barricaded at the further end, routed them, took their Camp, took their Generals Standard with the Kings Arms, and purified them over all the Country, which they held. If a Royal Army, and not (as this was) a Company of private adventurers, had thus begun the War in Galicia; I think it would have made the Spaniards to quit the Guard of Portugal, and make haste to the defence of their St. Jago, whose Temple was not far from the danger. But had they held their first resolution, as knowing that Sir John Norris his main intent was to bring Don Antonio with an Army into his Kingdom, whether coming first, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed, could they have hindered his landing in Portugal? Did not he land at Penicba, and march over the Country to Lybourn, six days journey? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) pass along by the River of Lybourn to Cascalis, and there, having won the Fort, quietly imbarke his men, and depart? But these, though no more than handily, yet were they English men. Let us consider of the matter it self, what another Nation might do, even against England, in landing an Army, by advantage of a Fleet, if we had none. This question, Whether an invading Army may be resisted at their landing upon the Coast of England, were there no Fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his Observations upon Cæsar's Commentaries, that maintains the affirmative. This he holds only upon supposition; in absence of our Shipping: and comparatively, as that it is a more safe and easie course to defend all the Coast of England, than to suffer an Enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way to keep our Enemy from treading upon our Ground: wherein if we fail, then must we seek to make him with that he had staid at his own Home. In such a case, if it should happen, our Judgments are to weigh many particular circumstances that belong unto this Discourse. But making the Question general and positive, Whether England, without help of her Fleet, be able to deter an Enemy from landing? I hold that it is unable to do, and therefore I think it most dangerous to make the adventure. For the encouragement of a first Victory to an Enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the Invaded, may draw after it a most perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marquis of Albalade, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complain, that by his Wanting Forces, wherewith to have kept the Frontier of Guienne, they of the Protestant Religion, after the Battel of Montcautier, entred that Country, and gathered great strength and relief thence; for if the King (saith he) would have given me but reasonable means, j'eu m'y garde a Monsieur P. Admiral, de faire boire les Chevaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his Horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Langey, on the contrary side, prefers the not fighting upon a Frontier with an invading Enemy, and commands the delay; which course the Constable of France held against the Emperor Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverse consideration to be had, between such a Country as France is, strengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of Invasions upon firm land, that these great Captains speak, whose entrances cannot be uncertain. But our question is, of an Army to be transported over Sea, and to be landed again in an Enemies Country, and the place left to the choice of the Invader. Hereunto I say, That such an Army cannot be resisted on the Coast of England, without a Fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the Coast of France, or any other Country; except every Creek, Port, or sandy Bay, had a powerful Army in each of them to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Ken is able to furnish twelve thousand Foot; and that those twelve thousand be laid in the three best landing places within that Country, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nisse, and six thousand at Foulston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these Troops (unless some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the Enemies Fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this provision, if the Enemy, setting sail from the Isle fused to the uttermost, with great laughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, and having the advantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extrem difficulty defend their Engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to understand the State of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to send into the Town. A certain Rhodian undertakes the service, and having received his dispatch, falls with one Gally to Ægusa, a little Island near Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and having a passing swiftly Gally, he past through the beft of the Channel, and recovered the Water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the Shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the dark night, nor dreading to be boarded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his return, he set sail, and shipping his Oars (his Gally being exceeding quick of sterage, and himself expert in all parts of the Channel) recovered the Havens mouth, and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then finding himself out of danger of being incompassed by many, he turned again towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to undertake him. This enterprife, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondered at in those days: and yet, where there was no great Artillery, nor any other Weapons of fire to kill a far off, the adventure which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious Man of War will not fear to pass by the best appointed Port of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leading gale of Wind, no, though forty pieces of great Artillery open their mouths against him, and threaten to tear him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queens time, when Denmark and Sweden were at War; our East-land Fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmark to trade with the Subjects of his Enemies, and he threatened to sink their Ships if they came through the Straights of Elfenor. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (having a Ship of her Majesty's called the Minion, to send them) made the adventure; and sustaining some Volleys of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the provision he could to stop them, and sink them at their return. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burroughs, leading the way, did not only pass out with little loss, but did beat down with Artillery, a great part of the Fort of Elfenor, which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the Fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any Wound received. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma, besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibility to master it, otherwise than by Famine, laid his Cannon on the bank of the River, so well to purpose, and so even with the face of the Water, that he thought it impossible for the least Boat to pass by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blown up by any wind of glory, but coming to find a good Market for their Butter and Cheese, even the poor men, attending their profit when all things were extrem dear in Antwerp, passed in Boats of ten or twelve Tun, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despite of it, when a strong Westerly Wind, and a Tide of flood favoured them; as also with a contrary Wind, and an ebbing Water, they turned back again: so as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado overhwart the River, to his marvelous trouble and charge.

The Fort St. Philip terrified not us in the year 1596, when we entered the Port of Caliz; neither did the Fort at Pental, when we were entered, beat us from our anchoring by it; though it plaid upon us with four Demi-cannons within point blank, from six in the morning till twelve at noon. The siege of Ofenda, and of many other places, may be given for proof, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good Ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so fit, as that of Angra in Tenera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the Ships are driven to turn upon a bow line towards it, wanting all help of Wind and Tide; there, and in such places it is of great use, and fearful: otherwise not.

But to return to our adventurous Rhodian: He arrives in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the Estate of Lilybæum. Others also, after this, take upon them to do the like, and perform it with the same success. The Romans therefore labour to choak the Channel, and for that purpose, fill many Merchants Ships with great stones, and sink them therein. The force of the Tides clears it again in part: but they grounded so many of those great belled Boats in the beft of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heap, like a ragged Island, in the passage. Hereby it came to pass, that a Carthaginian Gally taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ran her self a ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the brave Rhodian, thinking to enter as he had done before: but this Carthaginian Gally, a little before taken, gave him chafe, and gathered upon him; he finds what he is, both by her form, and by her swiftness: and being not able to run from her, resolved to fight with her: But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly distressed; the Souldiers being worn with labour and watching. But in this despair there rose fo violent a Tempest, as some of the Romans wooden Towers, by which they overtop the Walls of Lilybæum, were over-turned. A Greek Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blown unto by the bellows of a Tempest, it increased fo fast, as it became reftless, and in the end burned all ashes, and melted the brazen Heads of the battering Rams. Hereupon, despair and weariness hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolve, by a long siege, to starve the Defendants.

Upon relation of what had past, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Consul. He arrives at Messina, and marcheth over land to Lilybæum: where having re-inforced the Army, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprize of Drepanum, a City on the other side of the Bay of Lilybæum. This service the Captains and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consul imbarks his Troops, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Governour of the Town, a valiant and prudent Man of War, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybæum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but having recovered his spirits, he persuades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad than to be inclosed. Herewithal he promifeth great rewards to such, as by their Valour shall deserve them; offering to lead them himself, and to fight in the head head of his Fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consul, deceived of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal finds and follows his advantage, and forceth the Consul into a Bay at hand, wherein he rageth himself, having the land on his back: hoping thereby to keep himself from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-room, so streightened, as he could not turn himself any way from his Enemies, nor range himself in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of resistance, keeping the Shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with thirty Gallies besides his own, and so fled away: all the rest of his Fleet, to the number of ninety and four Ships, were taken or sunk by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this service is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiscretion and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great loss, armed threecore Gallies, with which they send away L. Junius, their Consul, to take charge of their business in Sicily. Junius arrives at Messina, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman Fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybæum. One hundred and twenty Gallies he had; and besides these, he had gotten together almost eight hundred Ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessary provisions for the Army. With this great Fleet he arrives at Syracuse, where he stales a while; partly to take in Corn; partly, to wait for some that were too slow of fall, to keep company with him along from Messina. In the mean time, he dispatcheth away towards Lilybæum, his Quæstors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one half of his Victuals, with some Gallies for their conveyance.

Adherbal was not careless, after his late Victory: but studied how to use it to the best advantage. The Ships and Prikkers that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his own Gallies he delivered thirty to Carthage, who had threecore and ten more under his own charge, and sent him to try what good might be done against the Roman Fleet, in the Haven of Lilybæum. According to this direction, Carthalo suddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he finds the Romans more attentive to the keeping of in the besieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their own against another Fleet. So he chargeth them, boards and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Camp takes alarm, and hastens to the rescue. But Himilco, Governour of the Town, is not behind hand; who falls out at the same time, and putting the Romans in great distress, gives Carthalo good leisure to go through with his Enterprife.

After this exploit, Carthalo ran all along the South Coast of Sicily, devising how to work mischief to the Enemy: wherein Fortune preferred him with a fair occasion, which he wisely managed. He was advertised by his Scouts, that they had desiered near at hand, a great Fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessels. These were the Victuals, which the Consul Junius, more hastily than providently, had sent before him towards Lilybæum. Carthalo was glad to hear of their coming, for he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late Victories. Accounting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulls approaching, to be rather a prey, than a Fleet, likely to make strong opposition, he hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no mind to fight, but were glad to seek shelter in an open Road, full of Rocks, under covert of a poor Town, belonging to their Party; that could help to save them only from the present danger, by lending them Engines and other aid, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that assailed them. The Carthals therefore having taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride under those Rocks, but would be forced, by any great change of Wind, either to put out into the deep, or to save their men how they could, by taking land, with the loss of all their Shipping. Whilst he was buied in this care, the Consul Junius drew near, and was discovered. Against him Carthalo makes out, and finds him altogether unprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had happened. The Consul had neither means to fly, nor ability to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creek, thinking no danger so great as that of the Enemy. The Carthaginian seeing this, betakes himself to a station between the two Roman Fleets, where he watcheth to see which of them would first stir, with a resolution to assault that, which should first dare to put it self into the Sea. So as now all the three Fleets were on the South Coast of Sicily, between the Prætorian of Pachinus and Lilybæum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the Wind stormeth at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of Tempest, and their signs, finding belike some swelling Billow (for so we do in the West of England, before a Southerly Storm) hastened to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to cover themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Navigate, and never found any foul weather in the entrails of their Beasts, their South-ayers being all Land-prophets, were suddenly overtaken with a boisterous South Wind, and all their Gallies forced against the Rocks, and utterly wrack.

This Calamity fo discouraged the Romans, that they resolved again to forsake the Seas, and trust only to the service of their Legions upon firm ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make War in an Island, against those that have a mighty Fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great Calamities which they had suffered through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient Vertue of the Spaniards. We seldom or never find that any Nation hath endured fo many misadventures and miseries as the Spaniards have done in their Indian Discoveries. Yet persisting in their Enterprises, with an invincible constancy, they have annexed to their Kingdom fo many goodly Provinces, as bury the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and Shipwracks, Famine, Overdrowns, Mutinies, Heat and Cold, Pestilence, and all manner of Difastes, both old and new, together with extrem Poverty, and want of all things needful, have been the Enemies, wherewith every one of their most noble Discoverers, at one time or other, hath encountered. Many years have passed over some of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea, more than one or two, have spent their Labour, their Wealth, and their Lives, in search of a golden Kingdom, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fifth Undertakers have not been disheartened. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Trea.

Treasures, and Paradises, which they enjoy; and well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The City of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar; who finally holds War with them five years. The Romans having emptied their common Treasures, build a great Fleet, at the charges of private men. The great Victory at Sea of Lucatius the Consul; where by the Carthaginians are forced to cruce Peace. The Conditions of the Peace between Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were careful, to supply with all industry, by Land, the want of strength at sea. Therefore they continue the Siege of Lilybæum, and seek to make sure to themselves all Places, whither the Enemies Ships could not bring Relief. The Consul Junius, to cure the wound of Dishonour, which he had received, bethought him what Enterprize to undertake. In the end he resolved to attempt the Mountain and City of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina, which was the fairest and richest of all the Island; and of these, by Cunning or Treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated between Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit Place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making Roads into the Countrey. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountain, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottom, (both which Places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the 18th. year of this War, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, surnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a Fleet and Army, who failing to the Coasts of Italy, did thoroughly repay the Spoils which the Romans made in Africa. For he first of all wasted and destroyed the Territories of the Locriens, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entered he into Sicily, and finding there no walled City in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to insult the Romans, he occupied a piece of Ground of great advantage, and lodged his Army thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himself between both Armies with admirable resolution.

The Place that Amilcar had seized upon, was not only very strong by Situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gave him opportunity, to scour all the Coast of Italy with his Fleet, waiting all along as far as to Cumæ. In the Isle of Sicily he held the Romans to hard work, lying near unto Panormus, where in three years abode he did many notable Acts, though not of much consequence, for that the Enemy could never be drawn to hazard the main chance. Having wearied himself and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he undertook a strange piece of work at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Junius, on the top, and at the bottom of the Mountain, were very strongly lodged. Nevertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conveyed his men into the City of Eryx, that was about the middle of the ascent, the Enemy knew of it. By this it came to pass, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountain, were straightly held (as it were) besieged. And no less was Amilcar himself restrained, by both of these Garisons, and such as came to relieve them. There he found them pastime about two years more; hoping still to weary out those that lay over his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those Quartern.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent unto the prosecuting of this business at Eryx. Wherein it seems true (as Hannibal, in Librie, spake unto Scipio) Lib. Dec. 4. 10. that the Affairs of Carthage never stood in better terms, since the beginning of the War, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses, partly upon confidence of their Land-forces, which they held restles; Amilcar, with a small Army, had so well acquired himself, to the honour of his Countrey, that by the trial of five years War, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equal, if not superior, to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had been devised and done, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warrior, no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once again to build a Fleet; whereby, if the mastery of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common Treasury was exhausted, and the coast was not little, that was requisite unto such an Enterprize. Wherefore there was no other way left, than to lay the burden upon private Pursts. Divers of the principal Citizens undertook to build (each at his own charges) one Quinqueme; which example wrought so well, that they, whose ability would not serve to do the like, joyined with some others, and laying their money together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another, with condition to be repaid, when the War was finished. By this voluntary Contribution, they made and furnished 200 new Quinquemes, taking for their pattern, that excellent swift rowing Galley which they had gotten from the Rhodians, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was shewed before. The charge of this Fleet was committed to C. Lucatius Catulus, who passed with the same into Sicily, the Spring following, and entered the Port of Drepanum, endeavouring by all means to have forced the City. But being advertised, that the Carthaginian Fleet was at hand, and being mindful of the late losses which his Predecessors had received, he was careful to put himself in order, against their arrival.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian Fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) with Picture, exceedingly formal, and skilful in the Art of seeming reverend. How his Reputation was first bred, I do not find, but it was upheld by a factious contradiction, of things undertaken by men more worthy than himself. This quality procured unto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is averse from new Enterprizes, and therewithal an opinion of great foresight, confirmed by every loss received. More particularly, he was gracious among the People, for that he was one of the most grievous oppressors of their subject Provinces; whereby he procured unto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithal such hatred, as turned it all to their great loss. He had ere this been employed against the Numidians, and wild Africans, that were more like to Rovers, than to Souldiers, in making War. Of those fugitive Nations, he learned to neglect more manly Enemies, to his own great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, duct, than by his malicious counsel, when, having shewed himself an unworthy Captain, he betook himself to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preserve the League between Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well he deserved of his own Countrey, it will appear hereafter: how beneficial he was to the Romans, it will appear, both hereafter, and in his present Voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessity of accepting, upon hard conditions, that Peace which he thenceforth commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Navy, with all needful Provisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexterity in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but he had neither been careful in training his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout Fellows. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian Fleet was enough, to make the unexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the restles force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceived aright, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to fail to Eryx, and there to discharge his Ships of their lading: and having thus lightened himself, he meant to take aboard some part of the Land-army, together with Amilcar himself, by whose help he doubted not, but that he should be able to make the Enemy repent of his new Adventure to Sea. This was a good course, if it could have been performed. But Catulus used all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this design: not because he was informed of the Enemies purpose, but for that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that he feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian Fleet was desired; yet he rather chose to fight with the Enemy, that had the wind of him, than to suffer this Convoy to pass along to Eryx, upon unlikely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno should have done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; he had lightened his Gallies of all unnecessary burthen; and he had taken aboard the choice men of the Roman Land-souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first Encounter, were utterly broken and defeated; having 50 of their Gallies stemmed and sunk, and 70 taken, wherein were few less than 10000 men, that were all made Prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of wind, escaping to the Isle of Hieronius.

The state of Carthage, utterly discouraged by this change of Fortune, knew not whereon to resolve. Means to repair their Fleet in any time there were none left; their best men of War by Sea were consumed; and Amilcar, upon whose valour and judgment the honour and safety of the Common-wealth rested, was now surrounded by his Enemies in Sicily, where he could not be relieved. In this extremity, they make a dispatch unto Amilcar himself, and authorize him to take what course should seem best unto his excellent wisdom; leaving all conclusions to his election and sole counsel.

Amilcar, whom no Adversity, accompanied with the least hope or possibility of recovery, had ever vanquished, looking over every promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) resolved to make trial, whether his necessity might be compounded upon any reasonable terms. He therefore sent to Lucatius the Consul an Overture of Peace: who considering it well, gathered for many Arguments from the present Poverty of the Roman State, waited beyond expectation in the former War, that he willingly hearkened unto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with provision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratify it with their allowance.

The Conditions were: First, That the Carthaginians should clearly abandon the Isle of Sicily. Secondly, That they should never undertake upon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, That they should set at liberty, and send back into Italy, all the Romans, whom they held Prisoners, without ransom. Lastly, That they should pay unto the Romans two thousand and two hundred Talents; which make, after 600 French Crowns to the Talent, thirteen hundred and twenty thousand Crowns: the same to be delivered within 20 years next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not thoroughly approved: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicily, to make perfect the Agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand Talents to the former Sum; and required a shorter time of payment. Further also, they took order, that the Carthaginians should not only depart out of Sicily itself, but should also withdraw their Companies out of all the other Islands between it and Italy, renouncing their whole Interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punick War, that had lasted about twenty four years without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by Fight or Shipwrack, about seven hundred Quinquemes, and the Carthaginians, about five hundred: the greatness of which losses, doth serve to prove the greatness both of these two Cities, and of the War: it self, wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in general, did shew themselves the braver Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthy Captain.

CHAP. II.

Of divers Actions passing between the first and second Punick Wars.

§. I.

Of the cruel War begun between the Carthaginians and their own Mercenaries.

THE Romans, having partly by Force and partly by Composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little Islands thereunto adjacent, gave them rather means and leisure to help themselves in a following War, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present Peace. It is a true Rule, Quid leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiunt à victis; That Laws are given by the Conquerors, and received of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the Answer that was made unto them, by one of the Privernates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this weighty business. For when one of Privernum, after a Rebellion, defending in the Senate the Cause of his City, was demanded by a Senator, What Peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in these words, Si bene dederitis, & fidem & perpetuum; si malum, haud disturbum; If the Peace be good and faithful that you give us, it will be perpetual; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this Answer, the Senate, at that time, gave such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem audiam; as credi posse, when populum, aut hominem denique in ea conditione, cuius cum peniteat, distans quam necesse fit manservum? That it was the speech of a manly, and a free man; for who could believe, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an overburdened estate, than meer necessity did enforce? Now if the Romans themselves could make this judgement, of those Nations, who had little else, besides their manly resolution, to defend their liberty; surely, they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferior unto themselves, would sit down any longer by the loss and dishonour received, than until they could recover their Legs, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take revenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) is only private men, but Kings and publick States, have more prevailed, than by any proper prowess or virtue; with-held the Tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearfully upon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after that the first Punick War was ended; Amilcar, leaving Erx, went to Lilybaeum, from whence most conveniently the Army might be transported into Africa: the care of which business he committed unto Geleo, to whom, as to a man of approved sufficiency, he delivered over his charge. Geleo had an especial consideration of the great Sums, wherein Carthage was indebted unto these Mercenaries; and, withal, of the great disability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them over (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that so the first might have their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arrived. Herein he dealt providently. For it had not been hard to perfwade any small number, lodged within so great a City as Carthage, unto some such reasonable composition, as the present empiness of the common Treasury did require: so that the first might have been friendly discharged, and a good president left unto the second and third, whilst their dis-junction had made them unable to recover their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrary opinion. They thought to find, in the whole Army, some that would be contented to gratifie the publick State, by remitting a great part of their own due: and hoped by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like Agreement and Capitulation. So they detained the first and second comers; telling them, that they would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the City, not accustomed unto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other Place where they might be less troublesome. This must be done by some colourable words of perfwasion: for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too far. Wherefore it is devised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellows, at Sicea: receiving every one a piece of Gold, to bear his charges in the mean while. This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers begin to dislodge; leaving behind them their Wives, their Children, and all their Baggage, as meaning flordy to fetch away all, when they came back for their Pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancy to their returning into the Town; and therefore compel them to trust up their Fardels, that they might have no occasion left, to make any errands thither. So to Sicea they removed, with all their Goods; and there lay waiting for news of their fellows arrival, and their own Pay. Business they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawn to mutiny: the whole argument of their Discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talk was, how rich they should be, when all their money came in; how much would fall to every single share; and for how long time the City was behind hand with them in reckoning. They were all grown Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could find most reason to increase crease their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long service was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captains, leading them forth to some dangerous Fight, were called to mind, as so many Obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some unordinary largess.

Thus the time passeth away, until the whole Army being arrived and lodged in Sicea, Hanno comes thither to clear the accompt. Now is the day come wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together in maintaining stoutly the common Cause. So think they all; and assemble themselves to hear what good news this Messenger had brought: with a full resolution to help his Memory, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many Promises made unto them; all which were to be considered in their Donative. Hanno begins a very formal Oration; wherein he bewails the Poverty of Carthage; tells them how great a sum of Money is to be paid unto the Romans; reckons up the exorbitant charges, wherewith the Common-wealth had been in the late War; and finally, desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their Pay, and out of the Love which they bare unto the City, to remit the rest. Few of them understood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Army was composed of sundry Nations, as Greeks, Africans, Gauls, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different Languages. Yet they stared upon him, and were (as I think) little pleased with his very Gesture. But when such as conceived the whole tenour of his Speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad men, so that nothing would serve to appease them. Hanno would fain have asswaged their Fury, but he knew not how: for he less understood their dissonant loud noises, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of many Countries, that have no one Language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred up to mutiny, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can do, is to use the help of Interpreters and Messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some for want of skill; others of set purpose, and such as deliver his Errands in the worst sense, are best believed. Finally, they think themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolve to demand their own in peremptory terms at a nearer distance. In this mood they leave Sicea, and march as far as Tania, that is within a little of Carthage, and there they encamp.

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their own error. It is a good rule:

Have special care, that valiant Poverty Be not oppress with too great injury.

But this proud City having neglected the rule, hath also been careless in providing to secure herself against the inconvenience that might follow. She had suffered the whole Multitude, whereunto she was like to give cause of discontent, to joyn it self into one body, when the several Troops might easily have been dispersed: the hath turned out of her Gates, the Wives, Children, and Goods of these poor men, which had she retained in view of kindness, she might have used them as Hostages for her own safety; and by employing a miserable Penny-father in her Negotiation with Men of War; she hath weakened the Reputation of her bravest Captains, that might best have served to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely enough it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be used as an instrument in defrauding his own Souldiers of their Wages: especially, considering that as he best could bear witness of their Merits, so was he not ignorant, that means to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had been willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable conjecture, that Hanno, with his Complices, who at this very time was a bitter Enemy to Amilcar, had the boldness to impose the blame of his own wretched Counsel, upon the liberal promises made by the Captains. Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him to have the managing of their own Plor, and to deal the Cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continued to do as foolishly as they had at first begun. They furnish a Market at Tania for the Souldiers, whom they suffered to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send ever and anon some of their Senators into the Camp; who promise to satisfy all demands, as far forth as it should be possible. And thus, by shifting from one extrem to another, they make the Souldiers understand into what fear the City was driven; which cannot but add much infolency to the passions already stirred up.

This sudden change of Weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon grows wise, and finding the Season fit, labours to make a great Harvest. Money must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many have lost their Hories in the publick Service of the State. The State shall pay for them. They had lived some years, by making hard shift, without receiving their allowance of Victuals from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not Meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one whether the Ships did bring in Provision, or their Captain directed them where to fetch it? But this would not serve. They said that they had been sometimes driven to buy; and that (since they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their Provision, during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that Wheat had born, whilst the War lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiniers; who might easily have been satisfied with far less Charges, and far more Honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make no end of craving. For whilst the Carthaginians are perplexed about this Corn-Money, the Souldiers have devised many more tricks whereby to extort a greater sum of money, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could be found of these Controversies, which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, should be chosen by the Souldiers to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Army consented, and made choice of Geleo: partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himself at all times a friendly man to them, and careful of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africa: partly out of a dislike which they had conceived of Amilcar, for that he had not visited them in all this busy time. So Geleo comes among them, and to please them the better, comes not without Money, which might give better countenance to his Proceedings, than barren Eloquence had done to the Negotiation of Hanno. He calls unto him first of all, the Captains, and then the several Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; advising them temperately concerning the present, and exhorting them to continue their love unto the State, which had long entertained them, and would always be mindful of their good services. After this he began to put hand to his Purse: offering to give them their whole Pay in hand, and then after to consider of other reckonings, at a more convenient time. This had been well accepted, and might have served to bring all to a quiet pass, if two seditious Ringleaders of the Multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Camp one Spendius, a sturdy Fellow, and audacious, but a Slave; that in the late War had fled from a Roman whom he served, and therefore stood in fear, lest he should be delivered back to his Master; at whose hands he could expect no less, than to be whipt and crucified. This Wretch could find no better way to prolong his own life, than by raising such Troubles as might serve to withdraw men from care of private matters, and make his own restitution impossible, were his Master never so importunate. With Spendius there associated himself one Matbo, an hor-headed man, that had been so forward in stirring up the Tumult, as he could not choose but fear, lest his own Death should become an example to deter others from the like seditious behaviour. This Matbo deals with his Country-men the Africans, telling them, that they were in far worse condition than either the Gauls, the Greeks, the Spaniards, or any foreign Mercenaries. For (saith he) these our Companions have no more to do, than to receive their Wages, and so get them gone; but we that are to stay behind in Africa, shall be called to another manner of account when we are left alone: so that we shall have cause to wish that we had returned home Beggars, rather than loiter with the Money, which (little though it be) shall break our backs. Yet we are not ignorant how tyrannically these our haughty Masters of Carthage do reign over us. They think it reasonable that our Lives and Goods should be at their disposition; which they have at other times been accustomed to take away from us, even without apparent cause, as it were, to declare their Sovereignty: what will they now do, seeing that we have demanded our selves as Free-men, and been bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our own, as others have done? Ye all do know that it were a very shame for us, if having been as forward in every danger of War as any other men, we should now stand quaking like Slaves, and not dare to open our mouths, when others take liberty to require their due. This notwithstanding we may assure your selves, that we are like to be taught better manners as soon as our Fellows are gone: in regard of whom, they are contented to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced Countenance. Let us therefore be wile, and consider that they hate and fear us. Their Hatred will show it self, when their Fear is once past, unless we now take our time, and whilst we are the stronger, ensnare them so greatly, that their Hatred shall not be able to do us wrong. All their Strength consisteth in Money, wherewithal they have hired others against us, and us against others. At the present they have neither Money nor Friends. The best army that ever served them, wherof we are no small part, lies at their Gates, ready to help us if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected, for were our Swords once drawn, all Africa would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whether can they send for help? The case is self is plain, but we must quickly resolve. Either we must prevent the diligence of Gelco, by incensing these Gauls and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behooveth us to please our good Masters, by joining with them against our Fellows; yea, by offering to forgive unto them all our Wages, if so (peradventure) they may be won to forgive us, or not over-cruelly to punish our Faults already committed. He is worthily a wretched Slave, that neither hath care to win his Masters Love, nor courage to attempt his own Liberty.

By such persuasions Matbo wins the African Soldiers to his own purpose. They are not now so greedy of Money as of quarrel; which he that seeks will not miss to find. When Gelco therefore offered to pay them their whole Stipend presently, but referred their other demands for Horses and Victuals, to some other more convenient time; they break into great outrage, and say, that they will have all, even all at once, and that out of hand. In this Tumult, the whole Army flock together about Matbo and Spendius: whose diligence is not wanting to add more Fuel to the Fire already blazing. Matbo and Spendius are the only men to whom the Soldiers will hearken: if any other stand up to make a speech, a shower of Stones flying about his ears, puts him to silence, that he shall never afterwards speak word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath been said already by these good spokesmen; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, save only throw, throw.

Now the Rebellion begins to take form. Matbo and Spendius are chosen Captains; who, followed by a desperate crew of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his own peace, but pursue their own ends, under fair pretence of the common Cause. All which notwithstanding, Gelco is not wanting to the good of his Country, but adventures himself upon their Fury. One while he deals with the Captains, and other principal men; seeking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: another while he works with the several Nations; putting them all in hope of their own hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so fallen as the Africans, indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorily to give them their own, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not so covetous as they seem, but will be more glad of an ill Answer, than of a good Payment. This is more than Gelco knows: he sees not that Matbo hath any more than bare words to bestow upon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsequence hear, he tells them, That they may do well, if they stand in want of Money, to seek it of their Captain, Matbo. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? they stay no longer, but lay violent hands upon the Treasure that he had brought; yea, upon him also, and all that are with him: as intending to take this in part of payment, and for the rest to take another course. Matbo and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their Fellows begin to grow calm, by his fair Language: wherefore they cast into Bonds both him and all the Carthaginians; that they can find, that so the Army may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this follows open War. Matbo solicits all Africa, and his Embassadors are every where well entertained. Neither is it needful to use perswasion; the very fame of this rebellion sufficeth to draw the whole Country into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions with which they have plagued others. It is true, that adversity hath never been untold of her errors:

errors: and as she is ever assured to hear her own, so commonly with her own she undergoes those of other men. The Africans, finding the Carthaginians hang under the Wheel, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were merciles; that they took from them the one half of their Corn, that they doubled their Tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted upon their Vassals the greatest Punishments for the least Offences. These Cruelties the Carthaginians themselves have forgotten: but the People that have suffered so much, retain all in perfect memory. Wherefore not only such as can bear Arms, are ready to do service in this great Commotion; but the very Women bring forth their Jewels and other Ornaments, offering all to fall for maintenance of so just a Quarrel. By this great forwardness, and liberal contribution, Matbo and Spendius are supplied with a strong aid of threecore and ten thousand Africans; and are moreover furnished with Money, not only to satisfy the present appetite of their men, but sufficient to continue the War begun, though it should be of long endurance.

§. II.

Diverse Observations upon this War with the Mercenaries.

† I.

Of Tyranny, and how Tyrants are driven to use help of Mercenaries.

HERE let us rest a while, as in a convenient breathing place: whence we may take prospect of the subject, over which we travel. Behold a tyrannical City, persecuted by her own Mercenaries with a deadly War. It is a common thing, as being almost necessary, that a Tyranny should be upheld by mercenary Forces: it is common that Mercenaries should be false: and it is common that all War made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and cruelty. Yet we seldom hear that the ruine of a Tyranny is procured or fought by those that were hired to maintain the Power of it: and seldom or never do we read of any War that hath been prosecuted with such inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyranny, is a violent Form of Government, not respecting the good of the Subjects, but only the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbear to say, that it is the unjust rule of one over many: for very truly doth Clem in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their Dominion over their Subjects was none other than a meer Tyranny; though it were so, that they themselves were a great City, and a Popular Estate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needful, that I should call this form of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience, to one regardless of his Life and Welfare; unless himself be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme Passion of Love. The practice of Tyranny is not always of a like extremity: for some Lords are more gentle than others to their very Slaves; and he that is most cruel to some, is mild enough towards others, though it be but for his own advantage. Nevertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers Discretion cannot extend it self, unto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of several men; it is commonly seen, that the taste of sweetness, drawn out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants Appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should he seek out bounds to prescribe unto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, he should have riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deal from every one: but every one could have spared more. He hath wrung all their Purse, and now he hath enough: but (as Covetousness is never satisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a Stock, though it were indeed a good yearly Income. Therefore he deviseth new tricks of Robbery, and is not better pleased with the Gains, than with the Art of getting. He is hared for this, and he knows it well: but he thinks by Cruelty to change Hatred into Fear. So he makes it his exercise to torment and murder all whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none unjustly, he may be said to deal craftily: but if Innocency be not false, how can all this make any Conspirator to stand in fear, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded than the quiet man? Wherefore he can think upon none other security, than to disarm all his Subjects; to forsake himself within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and State, to hire as many lusty Soldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not be of his own Country: for if not every one, yet some one or other might chance to have a feeling of the publick misery. This considered he allures unto him a desperate Rabble of Strangers, the most unonest that can be found; such as have neither Wealth nor Credit at Home, and will therefore be careful to support him, by whose only favour they are maintained. Now left any of these, either by detestation of his wickedness, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward than he doth give, should be drawn to turn his Sword against the Tyrant himself: they shall all be permitted to do as he doth; to Rob, to Ravish, to Murder, and to satisfy their own Appetites in most outrageous manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hateful to all men else. Considering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I must be fain to say, that these are not Dreams: though some English men perhaps that were unacquainted with History, lighting upon this Leaf, might suppose this Discourse to be little better. This is to shew, how many Tyranny grows to stand in need of mercenary Soldiers, and how those Mercenaries are, by mutual obligation, firmly assured unto the Tyrant.

† II.

That the Tyranny of a City over her Subjects, is worse than the Tyranny of one man: and that a Tyrannical City must likewise use mercenary Soldiers.

NOW concerning the Tyranny, wherewith a City or State oppresseth her Subjects; it may appear some ways to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A City is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearful of her Life: the less need hath she therefore, to secure her self by cruelty truelty. A City is not luxurious in consuming her treasures, and therefore needs the less to pluck from her subjects. If War, or any other great occasion drive her to necessity of taking from her Subjects more than ordinary sums of Money: the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs are so grievous and hateful, as those that are inolen. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperor to his Grandmother Antonia) that I may do what I list, and to whom I list: these words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harm. And several reckon it as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame upon her Slaves; that whilst she was whipping them, she painted her Face, talked with her Gossips, and used all signs of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grievances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sense of indignity: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of liberty make them weary of her Empire. In these respects it is not needful, that the should keep a Guard of licentious Cut-throats, and maintain them in all Villainy, as a Diomifus or Agatobolus must do: her own Citizens are able to terrify, and to hold perforce in obedience, all Malecontents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serve to prove, That a City is scarce able to deserve the Name of a Tyranny, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appear, That the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his People, are not so heavy, as the burthens imposed by a cruel City. Nor without some appearance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall have need to use the help of such distinctions as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascivious, when Cato was slain to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his Gravity might not hinder the People from calling for a show of naked Courtians, that were to be brought upon the open Stage? By common practise, and general approved custom, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private Vertue or Vice of any one man, nor by metaphysical abstraction of the Universal from the Singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I have said elsewhere) that it were better to live under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many thousands. The reasons proving this, are too many to set down: but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soever, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his Humour may be found, and soothed; Age, or good Advice, yea, or some unexpected accident may reform him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his Successor may prove better. Many Tyrants have been changed into worthy Kings: and many have ill used their ill-gotten Dominion, which becoming hereditary to their Posterity, hath grown into the most excellent form of Government, even a lawful Monarchy. But they that live under a tyrannical City, have no such hope: their Mistress is immortal, and will not slacken the reins, until they be pulled out of her hands; and her own mouth receive the bridle of a more mighty Chariotier. This is woful: yet their present sufferings make them less mindful of the future. New Flies, and hungry ones, fall upon the same fore, out of which, others had already fucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poor Kindred and Friends, who mean not to return home empty to their Hives, without a good loading of Wax and Honey. Thesie fly into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans Wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Province, is worthy to be desired: they becoming themselves Enemies, and all his fears: the Enemies that he feareth within a little space, the Enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these maleficial Guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endless labour (yet it must be undergone) were an endless labour (yet it must be undergone) and such as every one hath not means to go about: but were this effected, what availeth it? The Love of one Governour is purchased with Gifts: the Successor of this man, he is more loving than could be wished, in respect of a fair Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary Faction at home, a bitter Enemy to both his Fore-goers, who seeks the ruine of all that have been inward with them. So the miseries of this Tyranny are not simple; but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of Civil War. The Romans had a Law De Reptundis, or Of Recovery, against extorting Magistrates: yet we find, that it served not wholly to restrain their Provincial Governours; who presuming on the favour of their own Citizens, and of their Kindred and Friends at home, were bold in their Provinces, to work all these Enormities rehearsed, though somewhat the more sparingly, for fear of judgment. If the Subjects of Rome groaned under such oppressions: what must we think of those that were Vassals unto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthen-some Tributes; they loved not to hear that their Empire was grievous; they condemned many noble Citizens, for having been ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contrary: the Rapines newly devised by one Magistrate, served as Precedents to instruct another: every man resolved to do the like, when it should fall to his turn; and he was held a notable States-man, whose Robberies had been such, as might afford a good theme to the common Treafurer. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practise are not extant: the Government of Verres the Roman in Sicily, that is lively set out by Tully, may serve to inform us what was the demeanour of these Punic Rulers, who stood in fear of no such condemnation as Verres underwent. By prosecuting this discourse, I might infer a more general Proposition, That a City cannot govern her subject Provinces so mildly as a King: but it is enough to have showed, That the Tyranny of a City is far more intolerable than that of any one most wicked man.

Sutable to the cruelty of such Lords, is the hatred of their Subjects: and again, futable to the hatred of the Subjects, is the jealousy of their Lords. Hence it followed, that in Wars abroad, the Carthaginians durst use the service of African Soldiers; in Africa it self, they had rather be beholden to others that were farther fetch. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punic War, thrust his Mercenaries out of their own Countries: Ut Afris in Hispania, Hispania in Africa, Livi. De milibus proci ab domo futuris uterque milis, velis minus obligati, stipendia facerent; That the Africans might serve in Spain, the Spaniards in Africa, being each of them like to prove the better Soldiers, the farther they were from Home, as if they were obliged by mutual pledges. It is disputable, I confess, whether these African and Spanish Hiredlings, could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were subject unto Carthage, and carried into the Field, not only by Reward, but by Duty. Yet seeing their Duty was no better than enforced, and that it was not any love to the State, but meer desire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand upon propriety of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

† III.

The Dangers growing from the use of mercenary Soldiers, and foreign Auxiliaries.

THE extrem danger, growing from the Employment of such Soldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serve, than to those against whom they serve. They are feditious, unfaithful, disobedient, devourers, and destroyers of all Places and Countreys, wherinto they are drawn; as being held by no other Bond, than their own Commodity. Yea, that which is most fearful among such Hiredlings is, that they have often, and in time of greatest Exeremity, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted unto the contrary part; to the utter ruine of those Princes and States, that have trusted them. These Mercenaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italy, when Charles the eighth of France did pass the Alps, were the cause that the said French King won the Realm of Naples, with his Buckler without a Sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Milan; who being entertained by Queen Jean of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden; and forced her to put her self into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like unto his Father was Francis Sforza, the first of that Race, Duke of Milan: who, being entertained by the Milaneses, forced them to become his Slaves; even with the same Army which themselves had levied for their own defence. But Lodovick Sforza, the Son of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example unto Posterity, in losing his whole Estate by the Treachery of such faithless Mercenaries, as his own Father had been. For, having waged an Army of Switzers, and committed his Dutchy, together with his Person, into their hands; he was by them delivered up unto his Enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches to his dying day.

The like Inconvenience is found, in using the help of foreign Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired 10000 Turks, against his neighbour Princes; he could never, either by persuation or force, set them again over Sea unto Asia side: which gave beginning to the Christian Servitude, that soon after followed. Alexander, the Son of Cassander, fought Aid of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entered into his Kingdom, slew the same Alexander who had invited him, and made himself King of Macedon. Syprax the Turk was called into Aegypt by Samar the Sultan, against his Opposite: but this Turk did settle himself so surely in Aegypt, that Saladin his Successor became Lord thereof, and of all the holy Land, soon after. What need we look about for Examples of this kind? Every Kingdom, in effect, can furnish us. The Britains drew the Saxons into this our Countrey; but Alar Murrough drew the English into Ireland: but the one and the other soon became Lords of those two Kingdoms.

Against all this may be alledged, the good success of the united Provinces of the Netherlands, using none other than such kind of Soldiers, in their late War. Indeed these Low-Countreys have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthy, industrious, and valiant in their kind. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellency; neither are they bad, at the defence of a Place well fortified: but in open Field they have seldom been able to stand against the Spaniards. Necessity therefore compelled them to seek help abroad: and the like necessity made them forbear to arm any great numbers of their own. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the War: and therefore could ill spare, unto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more use in helping to fill the common Purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilst they had none other than mercenary Soldiers. Many fruitless Attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witness it: and that brave Commander, Count Lodovick of Nassau, felt it to his grief, in his retreat from Groenningen; when in the very instant, that required their service in Fight, his Mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and so ran away. This was not the only time, when the hired Soldiers of the States, have either fought to hide their Cowardize under a show of greediness; or at least, by meer Courtousness, have ruined in one hour the labour of many months. I will not stand to prove this by many Examples; for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the Honour of Monsieur, the Duke of Arvin, Brother to the French King; save that it is toly to conceal what all the World knows. He that would lay open the danger of foreign Auxiliaries, needeth no better pattern. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords over those, to whom they lend their Succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrey, made it his first work, to thrust by violence a galling Yoke upon the peoples Necks? Well, he lived to repent it, with grief enough. Even whilst he was counterfeiting unto those about him, that were ignorant of his Plot, an imaginary sorrow for the poor Burghers of Amwerp, as verily believing the Town to be surprized and won; the Death of the Count St. Aignan, who fell over the Wall, and the Cannon of the City, discharged against his own Troops, informed him better what had hapned, shewing that they were his own French, who stood in need of pity. Then was his feigned passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of mind; wherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veule tu faire de moy; Alas, my God, what wilt thou do with me? So the Affairs of the Netherlands will not serve to prove, that there is little danger in using mercenary Soldiers, or the help of foreign Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding they were obedient unto necessity, and sought help of the English, Saxons, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King paraker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Sovereignty of their Countrey, which they offered, yet being provoked by the Spaniards their Enemy, purified him with continual War; when the Heir of England reigned in Scotland, a King too just and wife (though not engaged in any Quarrel) either to make profit of his Neighbours Miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his own Inheritance : then might the Netherlanders very fairly repose confidence, in the Forces of their neighbour-Countries. The Soldiers that came unto them from hence, were (to omit many other commendations) not only regardless of the Pay that they should receive ; but well affected unto the Cause that they took in hand : or if any were cold in his devotion, to the side whereon he fought ; yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his own home, where the English would have rewarded him with Death, if his faith had been corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custody of Cities ; they were held as Friends, and Patrons ; the necessity of the poorer sort was relieved, before the Pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the ability of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintain against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a neighbour-Country, of the same Religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected : then may such a Country be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business, in hope of like success. But these Circumstances meet so seldom, as it may well hold true in general, That mercenary, and foreign auxiliary Forces, are no less dangerous, than the Enemy, against whom they are entertained.

I. IV.

That the moderate government of the Romans gave them assistance to use the service of their own Subjects in their Wars. That in man's nature there is an affection breeding Tyranny, which hindrers the use and benefit of the like moderation.

HERE may it be demanded, Whether also the Romans were not compelled to use service of other Soldiers in their many great Wars, but performed all by their own Citizens? for if it were their manner to arm their own Subjects; how happened it, that they feared no Rebellion? if Strangers; how then could they avoid the Inconveniences above rehearsed? The Answer is; That their Armies were compounded usually of their own Citizens, and of the Latines, in equal number : to which they added, as occasion required, some Companies of the Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their Subjects, as were either interested in the Quarrel, or might best be trusted. They had, about these Times, (though fabled they did employ so many) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other help had been wanting : which served to keep in good order their Subjects, that were always fewer in the Army than themselves. As for the Latines, if Consanguinity were not a sufficient Obligation; yet many Privileges and Immunities, which they enjoyed, made them assured unto the State of Rome : under which they lived almost at liberty, as being bound to little else, than to serve it in War. It is true, that a Yoke, how easie soever, seems troublesome to Freedom. Therefore many People of Italy have taken occasion of several Advantages, to deliver themselves from the Roman Subjection. But still they have been reclaimed by War; the Authors of Rebellion have been sharply punished ; and the People, by degrees, have obtained such liberty, as made them esteem none otherwise of Rome, than as the common City of all Italy. Yea, in process of time it was granted unto many Cities, and those far off removed, even to Tarfas in Cilicia, where St. Paul was born. That all the Burgesses should be free of Rome it self. This Favour was conferred absolutely upon some; upon some, with restraint of giving voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great Conquest, to release unto their new Subjects half of their Tribute which they had been wont to pay unto their former Lords, which was a ready way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition ; when the review of harder Times past, should rather teach them to fear a Relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking Innovation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a special note of the Romans good Government, That when some, for their well-deserving, have had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome; 1. they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with their own present estate. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Petelia, a City of the Brutians in Italy, chose rather to endure all extremity of War, than, upon any condition, to forsake the Romans; even when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were unable to help these their Subjects, and therefore willed them to look to their own good, as having been faithful to the utmost. Such love purchased these mild Governors, without impairing their Majesty thereby. The sum of all is : They had, of their own, a strong Army ; they doubled it, by adjoining thereunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other help of their own Subjects ; all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperity of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate use of sovereign Power being so effectual, in assuring the People unto their Lords, and consequently, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion : it may seem strange, that the practice of Tyranny, whose effects are contrary, hath been so common in all Ages. The like, I know, may be said, of all Vice, and Irregularity whatsoever. For it is less difficult (whoever think otherwise) and more safe, to keep the way of Justice and Honesty, than to turn aside from it ; yet commonly our Passions lead us into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Fear, or any the like Affection, seduceth our Reason ; the same unruly appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least wile take away all cause of wonder. In Tyranny it is no less : forasmuch as we can hardly desire the passion, that is of force to infatuate it self into the whole tenor of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawless desires have bred many Tyrants : yet so, that these desires have seldom been hereditary, or long-lasting ; but have ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death ; by which means the Government hath been reduced to a better form. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That Tyrannies are of short continuance. But this doth not satisfy the Question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyranny? why did the Athenians? why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their general good ; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safety of the Weal publick? If they were led hereunto by any affection ; what was that affection, wherein to many thousand Citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by Factions, did all concur, notwithstanding the much diversity of temper, and the vehemency of private hatred among them? Doubtless, we must be fain to say, That Tyranny is, by it self, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt, even by nature, to command, or to obey ; every one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankind, are common likewise unto brut Beasts ; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense : but the desire of Rule belongeth unto the nobler part of Reason ; whereunto is also answerable an aptness to yield obedience. Now as Hunger and Thirst are given by nature, not only to Man and Beast, but unto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their Life : as Fear, Anger, Lust, and other Affections are likewise natural, in convenient measure, both unto Mankind, and to all Creatures that have sense, for the flunning or repelling of harm, and seeking after that which is requisite : even to this desire of rule, which is requisite to arm the race ruling or obeying, engrafted by nature in the race of Man, and in Man only as a reasonable Creature, for the ordering of his Life, in a civil form of Justice. All these in-bred Qualities are good and useful. Nevertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkenness, which, in reproach, are called beastly ; by an improper term : since they grow from Appetites, found in less worthy Creatures than Beasts, and are yet not so common in Beasts, as in Men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as defend no lower than unto brut Beasts, are held less vile ; and perhaps not without good reason : yet are they more horrible, and punished more grievously, by harper Laws, as being in general more pernicious. But as no Corruption is worse, than that of which is best ; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a Vice more hurtful unto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble Root, even the depraved Affection of Ruling. Hence arise those two great Mischiefs, of which hath been an old Question in dispute, whether be the worse ; That all things, or that nothing, should be lawful. Of these, a dull Spirit, and over-loaden by fortune, with Power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one ; the other proceedeth from a contrary Distemper, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Under the extremity of either, no Country is able to subsist : yet the defective dulness, that permitteth any thing, will allow permit the execution of Law, to which, meer necessity doth enforce the ordinary Magistrate ; whereas Tyranny is more active, and pleaseth it self in the excess, with a false colour of Justice. Examples of Stupidity, and unaptness to rule, are not very frequent, though such Natures are every where found : for this quality troubles not it self in seeking Empire ; or if by some error of Fortune, it encounter therewithal, (as when Claudius, hiding himself in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some Friend, or else a Wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also Cruelty doth help to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing unknown, is without a Name. Tyranny is more bold, and feareth not to be known, but would be reputed honourable : for it is prosumum & felix scilicet, a fortunate mischief, as long as it can subsist. There is no Reward or Honour (saith Peter Charron) assigned to those, that know how to increase, or to preserve humane Nature : all Honours, Greatness, Riches, Dignities, Empires, Triumphs, Trophies, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. Cesar, and Alexander, have unmade and slain each of them, more than a million of men : but they made none, nor left none behind them. Such is the error of man's Judgement, in valuing things according to common Opinion. But the true Name of Tyranny, when it grows to ripeness, is none other, than Ferity : the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any Vice. It exceedeth indeed all other Vices, issuing from the Passions incident both to Man, and Beast ; no less than Perjury, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible Crimes, exceed in Villany, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkenness, that grow from more ignoble Appetites. Hereof Sermon, Procrustes, and Pisage campsies, that used their bodily force to the destruction of Mankind, are not better Examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius, and Agathocles, whose mischievous Heads were affixed by the Hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old Examples of Ferity, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of Reason : neither of them knew the use of Rule, nor the difference between Free-men, and Slaves.

The Rule of the Husband over the Wife, and of Parents over their Children, is natural, and appointed by God himself ; so that it is always, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Reason over Appetite ; the latter is the whole Authority, which one Freeman can have over another. The Rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole Country : which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is a greater, and more masterly Rule, which God gave unto Adam, when he said ; Have dominion over the fish of the Sea, and over the fowls of the Air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the Earth : which also he confirmed unto Noah and his Children, saying, The fear of you, and the dread of you, shall be upon every beast of the Earth, and upon every fowl of the Air, upon all that moveth upon the Earth, and upon all the fishes of the Sea ; into your hands are they delivered. He who gave this Dominion to Man, gave also an aptitude to use it. The execution of this Power hath since extended it self, over a great part of Mankind. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disability to govern themselves, proves them, according unto Aristotles Doctrine, to be naturally Slaves.

Yet find I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppress men with Bondage : unless the lawfulness 1. 6. 3. thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a Man shall not be punished for the death of a Servant, whom he hath slain by correction, if the Servant live a day or two, because he is his own Exod. 21. ney ; or else by the Captivity of the Midianitish 21. Num. 30. Girls, which were made Bond-slaves, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtless the custom hath been very ancient : for Noah laid this Curse upon Canaan, that he should Gen. 9. 25. be a servant of servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-servants, and maid-servants, which were none other than Slaves. Christian Religion is said to have abrogated this old kind of Servility : but surely, they are deceived, that think so. St. Paul desired the liberty of Onesimus Epist. to philem. for whom he had won unto Christ : yet wrote he Philem, for this unto Philemon, by way of request, craving 1. 14. it as a benefit, not urging it as a duty. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same St. Paul giveth unto Servants : Let every man abide in the same 1. Cor. 7. 20. calling wherein he was called : art thou called, being a servant? care not for it, but if thou mayst be made free, use it rather. It is true, that Christian Religion hath procured Liberty unto many ; not only in regard of Piety, but for that the Christian Masters stood in fear, of being disapproved by their Slaves, unto the Persecutors of Religion. Mahomet likewise by giving Liberty to his Followers, drew many unto his Impiety : but whether he forbade it, as unlawful, unto his Seditors, to hold one another hody, but in very good order, so that amazed with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this Overthrow, there were six thousand of the Mercenaries slain, and about two thousand taken; the rest fled; some to the Camp at Urica, others to the Town at the Bridge, whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that he was the place easily: the Enemies being thence also fled unto Tunis, as not having recollected their spirits to make it good.

The Fame of this Victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Towns revolted, partly by fear, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Matbo wanting to himself, in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africa for new supplies; admonishing the People, now or never to do their best, for the recovery of their freedom; he persuaded Spendius and Autaricus that was Captain of the Gauls, to wait upon Amilcar, and always to keep the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some Hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and he himself continued to press the Town of Hippagreta with an hard Siege. It was necessary for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his business required, to take such ways as there were: for all the Country lay not level. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, had once gotten a notable advantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plain surrounded with hills, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, they their Numidian and African succours. In this difficulty, the fame of Amilcar his personal worth did greatly benefit his Country. For Naravolus, a young Gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occasion serving to get the acquaintance and love of so brave a man, which he much desired: and therefore came unto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to do him all service. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend; promised unto him his own Daughter in Marriage; and so went from the Numidians two thousand Horse, that following Naravolus, turned unto the Carthaginians side. With this help he gave battle unto Spendius, wherein the Numidian laboured to approve his own Valour, to his new Friend. So the Victory was great: for there were slain ten thousand of Spendius his Fellows, and four thousand taken Prisoners, but Spendius himself, with Autaricus the Gauls, escaped to do more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his Prisoners: pardoning all Offences past, and dismissing as many as were unwilling to become his Followers; yet with condition, that they should never more bear Arms against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharp revenge upon all that should break this Covenant.

This Humanity was vehemently suspected by Matbo, Spendius, and Autaricus, as tending to win from them the Hearts of their Soldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take such order, that no man among them should dare to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safety, whilst Carthage was able to do him hurt. They counterfeited Letters of advertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their Company, respectful only of their private benefit, and careless of the general good, had a purpose to betray them all unto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needful to look well unto Geles and his Companions, whom these Traitors had a purpose to enlarge. Upon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the Soldiers, exhorting them to Fidelity; and shewing with manny words, that the seeming humanity of Amilcar toward some, was none other than a Bait, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as also telling them what a dangerous Enemy Geles would prove, if he might escape their hands. While he is yet in the midst of his Tale; were Letters come to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autaricus, and speaks his mind plainly: saying, that it were the best, yea, the only way, for the common safety, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were desirous to make their own Peace, it would go hard with those that had a care of the War; that it were better to make an end of Geles his Life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his Custody; that by such a course every one should be engaged in the present Action, as having none other hope left, than in Victory alone; finally, that such as would speak hereagainst, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autaricus was in great credit with the Soldiers, and could speak sundry Languages, in such sort, that he was understood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Geles, and all the other Prisoners, should forthwith be put to the horrible Death, by Torments. Nevertheless there were some, that for love of Geles, fought to alter this intended Cruelty, but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document unto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they herewithal contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian Prisoners which they took, should be served in like sort: and that the Subjects or Friends of Carthage should lose their hands, and so be sent home: which Rule they observed ever afterwards.

Of this Cruelty I need say no more, than that it was most execrable ferocity. As for the Council of using it, it was like unto the Council of Achitophel; All Israel shall bear that thou art abhorred of thy Father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee, be strong. Such are the fruits of depredation. He that is past all hope of Pardon, is afraid of his own Fellows, if they be more innocent; and to avoid the punishment of less Offences, committeth greater. The Cowardize of Offenders, and the revengeful Spirits of those that have been wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added, some deficiency of Laws, in distinguishing the Punishments of Malefactors according to the degree of their several Crimes. A Coward thinks all provision too little for his own security. If Phocas be a Coward (said the Emperor Mauritius) then is he murdrous. To be steadfast and sure in taking revenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defensive against new Injuries. But wrongfully: for it is opposite to the rule of Christianity; and such a quality discovered, makes them deadly Enemies, who otherwise would have repented, and sought to make amends for the wrong done in passion. This was it which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matbo and his Africans to suspect even their gentleness, as the introduction to extremity rigour. Like unto the Errors of Princes and Governors, are the Errors of Laws. Where one and the same punishment is awarded unto the less offence, and unto the greater, he that hath adventured to rob a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his own security.

Against these inconveniences, Mercy and Severity, used with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his own Soldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed by gentle courses, his humanity was ready to invite them: But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honesty and shame, he rewarded their Villany with answerable vengeance, casting them unto wild beasts to be devoured.

Until this time, Hanno, with the Army under his command, had kept himself apart from Amilcar, and done little, as may seem, for that nothing is remembered of him, since his late losses. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his help; as being able to do better without him. But when the War grew to such extremity, as threatened utter ruin to the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he joined his Forces. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled to do more than in former times: rather he could now perform nothing; such was the hatred between him and his unworthy Colleague. The Towns of Urica and Hippagreta, that had stood always firm on the Carthaginian Party, did now revolt unto the Enemy, murdering all the Soldiers that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The Provisions brought by Sea, for maintenance of the Army, were lost in foul weather: and Carthage it self stood in danger of being besieged, about which Matbo and Spendius consulted, whilst one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) bind the others hands.

It hath in all Ages been used as the safest course, to send forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Army. This was the common practise of those two mighty Cities, Athens and Rome; which other States and Princes have often imitated; perfwading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one as by two: who out of emulation to excel each other, will use the greater diligence. They have also joyned two chief Commanders in equal Commission, upon this further consideration; the better to restrain the ambition of any one that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hereof all Common-wealths have been jealous, having been taught by their examples, that have made themselves Tyrants over those Cities and States that have employed them. In this point the Venetians have been so circumfpect, as they have, for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their own, in all the Wars which they have made. It is true, that the equal authority of two commanding in chief, serveth well to bridle the ambition of one or both from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them trust: but in managing the War it self, it is commonly the cause of ill success. In Wars made near unto Rome it self, when two good Friends were Consuls, or such two at least as concurred in one desire of Triumph; which Honour (the greatest of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that one years service: it is no marvel, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts unto none other end than Victory. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose Power was neither hindered by any Partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one War; but each went, whichever his lot called him, to his own Province; unless one business seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joyned in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times prevail through their joyned Generals: yet was this never so seldom, without as much concord as any other virtue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often been such, that the less able Captain, though of equal authority, hath willingly submitted himself to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Army, received great and most dangerous overthrows; whereof in the second Punic War we shall find examples. On the contrary side, in their Wars most remote, that were always managed by one, they seldom failed to win exceeding Honour, as hereafter shall appear. Now of those ten Generals which served the Athenians at the Battle of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper been better than the judgment of the People that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affairs had found the same success which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Scio: the one being so over- wary, and the other so haughty, as all came to nought that they undertook; whereas Cimon alone, as also Arifides, and others, having free charge of all, did their Country and Common-wealth most remarkable service. For it is hard to find two great Captains of equal discretion and Valour; but that the one hath more of Fury than of Judgment, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are as often over-slip, as at other times many actions are unseasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condé was slain after the Battle of Iarnac (which Prince, together with the Admiral Chabot, had the Conduct of the Protestant Army) the Protestants did greatly bewail the loss of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, Person, and Birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hindrance to their Affairs. For so much did the Valour of the one out-reach the advisableness of the other, as whatsoever the Admiral intended to win by attending the advantage, the Prince adventured to lose, by being over-confident in his own Courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present business; who, though they were still sick of their ill grounded Love to Hanno, and were unwilling to disgrace him; yet feeling that all ran towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their Controversies unto the Army that served under them. The judgment of the Army was, that Hanno should depart the Camp: which he did; and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar; and that was enough.

After this, the Affairs of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matbo and Spendius had brought their Army near unto the City; and lay before it, as in a Siege. They might well be bold, to hope and adventure much; having in their Camp above fifty thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Nevertheless, the City was too strong for them to win by assault: and the entrance of Victuals they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by Friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuse, though during the Wars in Scio he assisted the Romans, and still continued in their Alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians; fearing their fall, and consequently his own; because if no other State gave the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principality of Syracuse would soon be devoured by them. The Romans also gave them some slender assistance, and for the present, refused good offers made unto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to shew a kind of noble disposi-on; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the fellow manifestly proved.

Whilst Matbo and his Followers were busily preffing the City, Amilcar was as diligent in waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more than straightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by fairly, they purposed to desert from their vain attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issue into the Field: where Spensius, and one they stile an African Captain assisting the Rebellion, Zarcas an African Captain assisting the Rebellion, take upon them to find Amilcar work; leaving Carthage to a general care of the business. The Elephants of Carthage, and Horse of Naravafus, made Spensius fearful to defend into the Plains. Where Spensius fearful to his former method of War, keeping the straightest Passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it self with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had the skill in this Art than could be matched by the labour of Spensius. He drew the Enemy to mazy Skirmishes; in all which, the Success was such, as added courage to his own men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, provoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giving them the Overthrow in plain Battel, until at length he got them into a Straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their judgment was enough to perceive their own disadvantage: and therefore they had the less stomach to fight; but awaited for help from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might teach them to dare impossibilities, used the benefit of their present fear, and shut them close up with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour that came not: and having spent all their Victuals, were so pinched with Hunger, that they fed upon the Boils of their Prisoners. This they suffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deserved any favour from Carthage; and hoping that their Friends at Tunis would not be unkindful of them. But when they were driven to such extremity, that they were fain to devour their own Companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of relief: their obstinacy was broken, and they threatened their Captains with what they had deserved, unless they would go forth to Amilcar, and seek such Peace as might be gotten. So Spensius, Zarcas, and Autarius, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved to obey the Multitude, and yield themselves, if it were to be required, unto the Death, rather than to perish by the hands of their own Companions. Hereupon they sent to crave Parley, which is granted; and these three come forth to talk with Amilcar in Person. What they could say unto him, it is hard to conjecture: yet by the Conditions which Amilcar granted, it seems that they took the blame upon themselves, and craved pardon for the Multitude. The Conditions were, that the Carthaginians should chuse out of the whole number of these Enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remain at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his Shirt, or in one single Coat. When the Peace was thus concluded, Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to fetch, with his whole Army in order. The Rebels, who knew not that Peace was concluded upon so gentle Articles, thought themselves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to Arms. But they wanted Captains to order them, and the lame affrontment that made them break the Covenants of Peace, whereof they were ignorant, gave unto Amilcar both colour of justice in accomplishing revenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slain: being forty thousand, or more in number.

This was a famous exploit, and the news thereof exceeding welcome to Carthage, and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward, Amilcar, with his Naravafus and Hannibal, carried the War from Town to Town, and found all places ready to yield: Utica and Hippagreta only standing out, upon fear of deserved vengeance; and Tunis being held by Matbo, with the remainder of his Army. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chief strength of the Enemy. Coming before this Town, they brought forth Spensius, with his Fellows, in view of the defendants, and crucified them under the Walls; to terrify those of his old Companions, that were still in Arms. With this rigour the Siege began, as if speedy Victory had been assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too far a-funder to help one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoved each to be the more circumspect.

Matbo from the Walls beheld his own destiny, in the misery of his Companion, and knew not how to avoid it otherwise, than by a cast at Dice with Fortune. So he brake out upon that part of the Carthaginian Army that lay secure, as if all danger were past, under the command of Hannibal: and with great and unexpected fury he fell, that after an exceeding laughter, he took Hannibal Prisoner; on whom, and thirty the most noble of the Carthaginian Prisoners, he presently revenged the Death of Spensius by the same Torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great loss, to continue the Siege, but was fain to break it up and remove unto the mouth of the River Bagradas, where he incamped.

The Terror was no less within Carthage, upon the fame of this loss, than had been the joy of the late great Victory. All that could bear Arms, were sent into the Field under Hanno, whom, it seems, they thought the most able of their Captains surviving the late accidents of War. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the employment of one sole General, near unto their City (for they are known to have trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hasty exigent, to devise about repealing it. But thirty principal men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcar's Camp, and by all good persuasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilcar in his Honour, that the carelessness of Hannibal seemed to be imputed unto him, by sending his Enemy to moderate his Proceedings. Nevertheless after many Conferences, the Authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made Friends; and thenceforth, whilst this War lasted, Hanno took warning by Hannibal's Calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the mean season Matbo was come abroad; as meaning to use the reputation of his late success, whilst it gave some life unto his business. He had reason to do as he did: but he wanted skill to deal with Amilcar. The Skirmishes, and light exercises of War, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so far abate the strength, and with-diminish the credit of Matbo, that he resolved to try the fortune of one Battel: wherein either his desires should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no less prone, than Matbo: as being weary of these long Troubles, and insupportable Expences; confident in the valour of their own men, which had approved it self in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar's great worth, whereunto the Enemy had not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making provision: inviting their Friends to help; and drawing forth into the Field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this Battel might have been foretold, without help of Witchcraft. Matbo, and his Followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring Spirits, which had been well cooled by the many late Skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as having often been victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their Enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the desire of Liberty should work so much, in men accustomed to Servitude; as the honour of their State would in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once engaged in that Adventure. So the Carthaginians won a great Victory, wherein most of the Africans their Enemies were slain; the rest fled into a Town, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yielded; and Matbo himself was taken alive. Immediately upon this Victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old Masters: Utica only, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of Favour. But they were soon forced, to take what Conditions best pleased the Victors. Matbo and his Fellows were led to Carthage in Triumph; where they suffered all Torments that could be devised, in recompence of the Mischief which they had wrought in this War. The War had lasted three years, and about four months, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose Subjects did not love them, should with less expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, have prevented in the beginning.

§. IV.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithless dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the Peace.

WHILST Matbo and Spensius were making this terrible Combustion in Africk, other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Babar the Governor, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Island to their own use. Against these one Hanno was sent with a small Army, (such as could be spared in that busy time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, levied on the sudden. But these Companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to join themselves with those that were already revolted, than to endanger themselves by Battel, for the good of that Common-weal, of which they had no care, began to enter into pratice with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to run one course of Fortune with them in their Enterprize. This their offer was kindly taken; but their Faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all Jealousie and Distrust, they resolved to hang up their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath been in all Ages, with those that have undertaken the quarrel of an unjust War, to enjoy the performance of some notorious and villanous act, to those that come in to them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawn, that desperate men can deliver to each other, to perform some such Actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a-kind of Cruelty did the ungrateful Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent unto them for their defence against the Lacedaemonians, by Aratus; who, when he had formerly possessed himself of their City, by right of War, did not only spare the sack and spoil thereof, but gave them equal freedom with the rest of the Cities united. These Revolutions are also common in our Court-wars; where, in the Conquests of new Fortunes, and making of new Parties, and Factions, without the depression or destruction of old Friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old Enemies. Ce font les coups de vieille et crime. These, (say the French) be the Blows of the old Art of Fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit less violent in their purpose, than were Spensius, and his Associates: only they wanted a Matbo among them, to negotiate with the Inhabitants of the Province. The Ilanders were no less glad, than the Soldiers, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Country: but they could not agree about the profit of the Victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the Soldiers for their pains taken. Contrariwise, the Soldiers were of opinion, that the Title of the Carthaginians to that Isle, was devolved unto themselves, by right of Conquest. The same Quarrel would (in likelihood) have risen, between Spensius with his Mercenaries, and their African Friends, if the common desire of both had once taken effect: unless the Riches of Carthage, had served to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrey, the matter was not easily taken up. So they fell to Blows; which how they were dealt I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to save themselves in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it, with as good right, as the Mantineans had called them into Sicily. Yet this offer was refused, upon Reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matbo and Spensius with Corn; of whom the Carthaginians took almost five hundred, and held them in Prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Ambassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all Provisions to Carthage. And upon the same Reason, did they forbid to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the City of Utica, offering it self unto their subjection. This might have served, as a notable example of the Roman Faith, to all posterity: had not the issue proved, that it was meer regard of greater profit, fit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of Faith. The whole Estate of Carthage depended, at that time, upon the Virtue of Amilcar: who had been overthrown by Scipio or Marbo, in one main Battle, that mighty City must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of mercilefs Villains, or have humbled her self under protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately driven for Superiority. That extreme necessity, whereinto Matho reduced the City, by the fortune of one Sally made out of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not far from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not unwilfully done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindness, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but sinking Ship, to run her self aground upon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africa, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia, then did Ambition put off her goodly vizor. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet again, began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced War against this ensleaved and impoverished City, under a shameless pretence, That the Preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeed against Rome it self. The Carthaginians knew themselves unable to resist; and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have had twelve hundred Talents, in recompence belike (for I live not what Reason they could alledge) of the great fear which they had endured, of an Invasion from Carthage. It is indeed plain, that they impudently sought occasion of War; and the money was paid, how hardly soever it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punic faith, in breach of Covenants: she herself hath broken the Peace already, which Amilcar purposed to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar lives not to perform, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned Son.

§. V.

How the Affairs of Carthage went between the African Rebellion, and the second Punic War.

THE injurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to pick a quarrel, served to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessary lesson. That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient unto those that were more mighty. In a City long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easily took place: and the best means were thought upon, for the increase of Puissance and Empire. The strength, and the jealousy of the Romans, forbade all Attempts upon the Mediterranean Seas; but the Riches of Spain, that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: wherefore that Province might serve, both to exercise the Carthaginians in War, and to repair their decayed Forces, with all needful Supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and sovereign trust was committed unto Amilcar: upon whom his Country did wholly repose it self; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other envious men, that were of his Faction, took little pleasure in the general love and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his Friends. Yet could they not deny him to be the most worthy of Command in all the City: only they commended peace and quietness; advising men to beware of provoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such Discourses, harsh to the ears of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weal, they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant folk suspected to be wilful idiom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually upheld and enlarged, by many notable Services that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the Streights of Heraclus (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the Western Coast of Spain; in which Countrey, during nine years that he lived there, he subjected unto the State of Carthage the better parts of all those Provinces. But finally, in a Battle that he fought with a Nation in Portugal, called the Vettones (defending himself a long time with an admirable resolution) he was invironed and slain: carrying with him to the Grave the fame great Honour and Fame, by which in many signal Victories, he had acquired the Name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his Son-in-law was made General of the Carthaginian Forces in Spain. This was a good man of War; but far better in practice and cunning, than in deeds of Arms. By his notable dexterity in matter of Negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding to many Subjects and Confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow jealous again of this hasty increase. He built a goodly City, upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdom of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gave it the Name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearly retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this success of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled, but began to cause their own negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much pains to beat them out of the Isle of Sicily, as full of peccing their Neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbering themselves in a War of far less importance, (whereof I shall speak anon) given them leisure, without interruption, to recover up again on their own Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to help this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be invaded by the Gauls, their ancient Enemies, and nearest Neighbour to the West. But he needeth little help of force, that knoweth himself to be feared: it is enough if he request, since his request shall have the virtue of a Command.

Yet were the Romans usually destitute of all good colour, that might help them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the Name: so that there were no Martinetes, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman Succours. But in the Enterprize of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serve their turn in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish Affairs had no relation to the Peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his Victories unto the Gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman Frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had been suspected) they they sent unto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceed any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their Messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they seem to have hoped, that howsoever the generosity of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter Pills, to avoid all occasion of War with Rome; yet the Bravery of one man might prove more audacious, and, resenting the Injury, return such Answer, as would entangle his whole Countrey in the Quarrel, that they so much desired; and might embarras at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would have this insolent Covenant inserted into the Articles of Peace, he took upon him to do it, of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their ways contented, and sought no further.

If it had been so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto preffed by the Romans, for fear of present War, had ratified this new Composition made by Asdrubal, yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, unless an Oath had also been extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, under the bare Authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of Peace: whereas of the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of Perjury, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treaty with Asdrubal, the Romans went some Repaty in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the City which would needs be Mistress over them, stood in fear of receiving Blows from a flouter Dame, there were soon found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a People on the South-side of Iberus, entered into Confederacy with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawful unto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other People (neither Subject, nor open Enemy in War to the Carthaginians) into their society: and unlawful it was unto the Carthaginians: to use violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Nevertheless, if we consider the late Agreement made with Asdrubal, we shall find that the Romans could have none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit Covenant of making the River Iberus a Bound, over which they themselves would not pass, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made upon Spain: in which regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that River, held almost all the Countrey. Howsoever it were, this Indignity was not so easily digested, as former Injuries had been. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater Power than the Carthaginians, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, upon confidence of help from a more mighty City. Wherefore either in this respect; or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest injuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themselves right, War against Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such terms were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spain eight years:

(being slain by a Slave, whose Master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, Son of the Great Amilcar, was chosen General in his stead.

§. V. I.

The Estate of Greece from the Death of Pyrrhus, to the Reign of Philip the Son of Demetrius in Macedonia.

IN the long term of the first Punic War, and the vacation following, between it and the second, the Estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was grown somewhat like unto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though far weaker, as in an After-spring. The whole Countrey had recovered, by degrees, a form of Liberty: the petty Tyrannies (bred of those inferior Captains, which in the Times of general Combustion, had seized each upon such Towns as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatness, as not only served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like Diffensions and Tumults in Macedon, as had been in Greece, when Philip first began to inchoate upon it. For after many Quarrels and great Wars, about the Kingdom of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gauls, Antigonus, the Son of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fix and thirty years; yet so, that he was divers times thence expelled, not only by the Gauls, and by Pyrrhus, as hath been already shewed, but by Alexander the Son of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose Father he had hardly won it. This happened unto him by the revolt of his Souldiers, even at such time, as having overthrown with great slaughter an Army of the Gauls, he was converting his Forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garisons. But his young Son Demetrius raised an Army, where-with he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epiros, and restored his Father to the Kingdom.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius, (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadel of Corinth: which was justly termed the Filter of Greece. This Citadel called Acrocorinthus, stood upon a steep rocky Hill on the North-side of the Town; and was by Nature and Art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the Town; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running between the Ægean and Ionique Seas, joyneth Peloponnesus to the Main of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by Land from one half of Greece unto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, upon both of which, this rich and goodly City had commodious Havens. Alexander, the Son of Polyperchon; and after his death, Cratespolis his Wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Towns, that was made between Alexander's Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, until it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I find nothing else, than that he was thought to be poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his Wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a Trick. The device was this. Antigonus sent his young Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicea, and seek her Marriage. The foolish old Widow perceived not how unfit a Match the to require the benefit with some great mischief. They law that the Achaens were desirous to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance and Corporate on: of which intent, the Lacedaemonians laboured earnestly to fet the Lacedaemonians and Achaens together by the ears: hoping that if this might come to pass, they themselves should be called into help (it skilled not on what side) and so get no small share, both in booty and Territory. Neither did they forbear to communicate their device unto Antigonum; offering to make him partaker of their Gain, whom they knew to be offended with the Achaens. Of this Plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedaemonians cause to take Arms. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late, and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been meddling with the Achaens, that were dependants of Lacedaemon, and thereby had provoked the Lacedaemonians to look about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Arcaadians their Friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achaean.

The City of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subject to the injuries of any stronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakened it: The Ætolians contriving Lacedaemon with an Army, had carried away fifty thousand Slaves; and, which was worse, their Discipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxury reigned among them, the poor was oppressed by the rich, and the generosity of spirit, that had sometime been their general Vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than seven hundred natural Citizens, of whom not above one hundred had Lands, all the rest were needy People, and desirous of innovation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition, which endangered the City most of all. Agis a good King, who fought to reform the disorders of the State, exhorted the People to a strict observation of Lycurgus his Laws. To which purpose he caused them to pass an Act for the abolishing of all Debts, and equal division of Lands. All the younger and the poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. There had recourse unto Leonidas the other King (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part, being himself a difficult man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his Wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the City, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his Friends and Counsellors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their own private Commodity. They were hasty to take away all Debts, and cancel Bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted: but the division of Lands they afterwards hindered, because their own Possessions were great. Hence arose a Tumult in Sparta, which these men increased, by their foul oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine Leonidas was brought home, and reformed to his Kingdom, and the two adverse Kings driven to take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late made King was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into Prison, and there by his Enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-Mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this Cruelty proceeded from the Ephebi, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the Laws, using their Power, and more Power than to them belonged, against a King that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City, as the Laws required.

The Death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens, and served to establish the important rule of a few tyrannical Oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adjoin Lacedaemon to the Achaean Commonwealth, though it were great injustice to take such advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the general good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it self, if it could have been wrought by persuasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did also require the unjust attempts of the Achaens, even in their own kind: obtruding upon them by force, an union of all Peloponnesus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedaemonians and their King, should have been the principal; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus vacated Agis to be slain, took his Wife that was very rich and beautiful, and gave her in Marriage (perforce) to his own Son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly enamoured on his Wife, and sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former Husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertain a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So coming himself to be King, whilst he was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of War: for that he hoped by strong hand, to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an Estate of the City, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephebi gave him in charge to take and fortify Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Lacedaemon, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended Title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but fought to take by surpris Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedaemonians: wherein his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painful nights travel, and discovered his enmity to Sparta, of which Cleomenes was nothing sorry. By these degrees the War began. In the entrance whereof Aratus had discovered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would have staid the Quarrel from proceeding too far. But Lysidas and Arifmachus would needs fight, and he could do no other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so urgent. Arifmachus was at that time General of the Achaens (He and Lysidas being of great account, since they had abandoned their Tyranny) who sent unto Aratus, lying then in Athenæ, and required his assistance in a Journey to be made into Lacedaemon. No dissolutions of Aratus would serve, therefore he came in person, and took part of a business little pleasing him in the present, and less in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight, but opposed himself against Arifmachus, who desired to give Battel. Yet had the Achaens twenty thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse in their Army: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedaemonian, and raised an ill report upon Aratus; which Lysidas helped to make worse, by accusing his Cowardize. Nevertheless the Achaens would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their General the year following, against Lysidas his Accuser that sued for the place. Being General himself, it behoved him to confute with deeds, the slanderous words of Lysidas. Therefore he purposed to set upon the

the Eleans: but was met withal on the way, near unto the Mount Lycaeus. By Cleomenes, who vanquished him in a great Battel, and drove him to hide himself all night for fear, so that he was thought to have been slain. This misadventure Aratus recompensed by a trick of his own more natural occupation: performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have been expected, had he been victorious. For whilst there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could undertake; he secretly wrought with some of the Montanians, who did let him into their City. The Montanians had once before joyned themselves with the Achaens; but shortly upon fear, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Ætolians, and from the Ætolians, presently after this Victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their levity they were not punished, but freely admitted now again into the Achaean Society. As this good success repaired the credit of Aratus, so another Battel almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered near unto Megalopolis, where the Achaens had somewhat the better at the first, but their General durst not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lysidas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger, and taking with him all the Horse, brake upon the Lacedaemonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slain by them, and his Followers driven back upon their own Companions, in such sort, that finally all the Army was disordered, and put to flight. This was a great loss, and incensed the Achaens against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution towards the Pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus took patiently, and followed the War nevertheless; wherein, though Cleomenes was some Towns, and Aratus got the better in one small Fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achaens being weary, and the Spartan King intensive to another business.

Cleomenes having led into the Field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painful Journeys, to look the Achaean War on a sudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he slew the Ephebi, and restored by force the ancient Discipline of Lycurgus. Then gave he an account of his doings, and shewing by what degrees the Ephebi had incroached upon the Power of Kings, and many Disorders had grown in the City; he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by chusing new out of such as were Friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Country might not altogether stand in need of mercenary help, as it lately had done, to save it self from the Ætolians, Ilyrians, and other Enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; for the Spartans well satisfied, and Cleomenes himself ready in the Field, ere his Enemies could take advantage of these his Domestic Troubles.

The Achaens hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the City, for fear of some Rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard that he had wasted all the Country of Megalopolis; had ranged over all Arcaidia at his pleasure; and was admitted unto Maninæa, and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. These news displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to hear worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the Power of the Ephebi, that curbed his Authority, he proceeded more boldly in his work, being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedaemonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himself had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the Possession of a few Towns: but adventured to win or lose all. The Ætolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side; and whereas he had gotten Maninæa, Tegea, and other places, to which they had some Title, they willingly renounced all their interest unto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Country, and saw that Antigonum with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begun. Therefore he devised how to provide against the worst, and either to repair all, or (if it could not be) to save all from utter ruine. The Office of General when it was next put upon him, he refused; fearing to be so far preft as to hazard in one Battel all the Force of his Country, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance Courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted by surpris, and depended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Iryls, and of all other Nations, over-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forsake the care of the weak publick, though in aiming at the general good, it seems that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazard of Battel; that Maninæa had not only opened her Gates unto Cleomenes, but slain the Achaean Garrison that lay therein; that other Towns had yielded unto him, without compulsion; and that Arifmachus, once Tyrant of Argis, and since General of the Achaens, was now revolved unto the Enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Pelamy was too far off to help, and the nearness of Antigonum was very dangerous; yet might be useful, if this King, would (as Polybus saith) like others, be Friend or Enemy, as should best agree with his own profit. To make tryal hereof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpose, and instructed them how to deal with both Antigonum, and the Achaens.

The City of Megalopolis had been well affected to the Macedonians, ever since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by some special benefits. At this time it lay nearest unto the danger; was very faithful, and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achaens, with their own proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should be sent unto the general Council of Achaia, requesting leave and good allowance, to try the favour of Antigonum in their necessity. This was granted, for lack of what else to answer: and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonum. They did their own errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their City had of long time born unto him and his Predecessors; of their present need, and how it would agree with his Honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more general matter, wherein Aratus had given them instruction, shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his own great loss or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himself did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaens under the Pa-tragnage of Macedonia: then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their discourse. He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help should not be wanting, so far forth, as it might stand with the Acheans good liking. Particularly he commended himself, by these Messengers to Aratus; assuring them, that he thought himself highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to have been grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a just and worthy love to his own Nation. With this answer they return to Megalopolis: and are presently sent away to the Council of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required.

The Acheans were glad to hear that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; and therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his consent, and praised the Wisdom of his Country-men, that so well discerned the best and likeliest means of their common safety: adding nevertheless, that it were not amiss, first of all to try their own ability; which if it failed, then should they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himself moderate, in that which himself of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustain the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amiss, since it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leisurely, the general consent.

Nevertheless, in true estimation, this fineness of Aratus might have been used, with his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had been more honourable to make an end of the War, by yielding unto Cleomenes that Power which they gave unto Antigonus: since thereby he should both have freed his Country from all further trouble; and withal, should have restored unto the universal State of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pity) that Vertue having risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it self (as it were) in the seat of Principality, by length of time, and success of many actions; can ill endure the hasty growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it self likely to be over-topped. Other cause to despise the Lacedaemonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himself more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was justly plagued, when he saw his own Honours reversed by the insolent Macedonians; and instead of living as a Companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long Race of Kings, the Posterity of Hercules, was fain to do sacrifice unto Antigonus as unto a God, and was finally possessed by Philip, whose Nobility was but of five descents, and whom perhaps he might have seen his Fellow, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the Love of Protrius was lost: who forthwith took part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberality as he had used to the Acheans; being warned, as may seem by their example, to be more wary, both in trusting and dis-trusting. Cleomenes him self, whilst this business with Antigonus was a foot, passed through Arcadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Acheans to Battle. At the City of Dyme in Achaia were assembled all the remaining Forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make trial, whether perhaps they might amend their Estate, without seeking help of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where he had to great a Victory, that the Enemy was no longer able to keep the open Field. The Calamity was such, that Aratus himself durst not take upon him to be their General, when his turn came in the next Election. Wherefore the Acheans were compelled to sue for Peace; which was granted upon this ease condition: That they should not arrogate unto themselves the Command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedaemonians (as in former Ages) to be their Leaders in War. Hereunto, if they would condescend, he promised unto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his Prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Acheans, who desired him to come unto the City of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held for the conclusion of the War.

Now seemed the Affairs of Greece likely to be settled in better order than they had ever been since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Wars, yea, or since the Persian Invasion, when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindered all with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in a great heat, and thereupon fell extrem sick, and to could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheless he sent home the chief of his Prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good Faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Acheans in their desire of his Friendship: who assembled again at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it, and fought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Country-men afraid of resolving. When all would not serve turn, he brook himself to his cunning, and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos, receiving Hostages for safety of his Person. Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this advertisement: and took it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had been an easie matter to have told him so much at the first, and not have made him come so far with an Army, which afterwards he must dismiss. Yet that which chiefly seems to have troubled him, was the drift of his Oppugners, who fought thereby, either to make him wait without the Gates, and deal only with themselves and their Messengers; or if he would adventure himself into the City, then to deprive him of all Royal shew, that might breed respect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, and for which he sought to hinder his coming thither in person, lest the People hearing the Promises of Cleomenes ratified by his own mouth, should presently be won with his gentle words, and finish the Bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Council, bitterly complaining against these juggling tricks: and Aratus was not far behind with him, in as bitter an Oration. So between fear of the one, and reverence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all as it were to Fortune. Cleomenes took his advantage of their present weakness, and renewed the War. Many Cities yielded unto him willingly, many he forced, and partly by force, partly by terror, he wan

Argos

Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could do. In this case Aratus sent his own Son to Cleomenes, entreating him to defer no time, but come presently to relieve the distressed Acheans. Cleomenes gave as good words as could be wished: saying that he utterly refused to do any thing, unless he might first have Acrocorinthum put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promised to help the Horse against his Enemy the Stag: but with condition, that the Horse should suffer himself to be killed and bridled. Aratus was herewithal vexed, but wanted all honest colour to do it: the Corinthians had no way deluded to be thence away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an opportunity was found, for that the Corinthians perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himself out of their City, and sent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ran to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to save it from Antigonus, by surrounding it with Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leave. Whilst this was in doing, he took special order that Aratus his House and Goods within the Town, should be safely kept for the Owner, to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians and Illyrians to Peloponnesus: promising that if he would hearken to these persuasions, then would he give him double the price Pension, which he had been wont to receive of King Protrius. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the Gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured Sovereignty of the Country; he desired that it might not be committed unto his own disposition, but be joyfully kept by the Lacedaemonians and Acheans. All this entreaty served to no purpose. For Aratus rejecting utterly the motion, sent his own Son as an Hostage to Antigonus, and laboured with the Acheans to put Acrocorinthum into his hands. Which when Cleomenes understood, he seized upon the Goods of Aratus in Corinth, and waited all the Country of Sicyon, whereof this his Adversary was native.

Antigonus in the mean time drew near to the Illyrians having passed with his Army through Euboea, because the Attolians held the Straights of Thermopylae against him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatness, whereunto the Macedonians might attain by the good success of this Journey. At his coming thither he found the Lacedaemonians ready to forbid his entrance, and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazard battle, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force, but he was not able so to do: he secretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out again, with great loss of men; finally, he resolved to turn aside, and seek a passage over the Gulf of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity news from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no less troubled his Enemies. The Acheans were gotten into that City; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citadel, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present help. Argos had always been Enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedonia. When Cleomenes took it, he forbore to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of Friends; and partly, for that they all made themselves to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his Victory, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all Debtors to be discharged from their Creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would have been tyrannical, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turn good Common-wealths men, and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not do the like abroad. So they took at their time, invaded the Acheans, assailed his Garrison, cut in pieces the Refuge that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the defence of Corinth, and look unto the Enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood, by continual Messengers, that his men which he began to fear, left his labour in guarding the entry, should grow frivolous; the Acheans in the mean while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsook his custody of the Illyrians, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he could save, he meant to trust Fortune with the rest. And so both Argives and Acheans were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the Streets: when the Horse-men of Antigonus were discovered a far off, halting to relieve the Citizens, and Antigonus himself (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soon as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, than to make a safe retreat. This he did, and got hint home into Laconia, losing in short space all, or most, of that which he had been long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himself at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he took his way to Agium, where was held a Parliament by the Acheans: to whom he declared the cause of his coming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Acheans were not behind with him, but made him Captain General over them and their Confederates, and further entered into Covenant with him, That they should not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassage, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon his own Town (for Winter was come on) where he not only feared him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane Honours, as sacrifices, and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Stoicism, which had been followed by the rest of Achaia; if instead of made (forsooth) a very vile bargain, if it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poor, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Acheans. This was hardly taken, yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himself over-carefully respected, when the Statues of those Tyrants erected by Antigonus; or when the Statues which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthum with him, were all thrown down by the same King, and one only left.

was for the young Prince, but entertained the fancy of Marriage; whereto the old King was even as ready to consent, as was his Son to desire it, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with Sacrifices, Feasts, Plays, and all sorts of Games: in the midst of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poor Lady, whose jealousy had been exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not contain himself within the gravity befitting his old Age. But as he had stolen it, so was it again stolen from him: neither lived he to revenge the loss of it, being already spent with Age.

Demetrius, the Son of this Antigonus, succeeding unto his Father, reigned ten years. He made greater proof of his Virtue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Acheans, held him continually buied in War; wherein his Fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these Times the Power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Grecians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the only Son of Demetrius, was a young Child when his Father died; and therefore Antigonus, his Uncle, had the charge of the Kingdom, during the minority of the Prince; but he assumed the Name and Power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own Son, to whom he left the Crown at his death. This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Dolon, that is as much as Wile-guess, because he was slow in his liberality. He respected the Dardanians, and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdom, in the beginning of his Reign. Upon confidence of this good Service, he took for fair words, and a seeming unwillingness of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Acheans took from him the City of Athens, soon after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all or most that he held in Greece, if their own Estate had not been endangered by a nearer Enemy. But civil Dissention, which had overthrown the Power of Greece, when it flourished most, overthrew it easily now again, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sickness; and gave to this Antigonus no less Audio ijs therein, than Philip, the Father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Acheans, from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most renowned Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Laws, and by their Clemency (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others to their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be governed by one Law, and to use one and the same sort of Weights, Measure, and Money.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that united them again; and gave them courage, after that they had been by the Macedonian Captains divided into many Principalities. In elder Times they were governed by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of Rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heracides, when Tisamenus the Son of Orestes possessed the Territory of Achaia. In this Estate they continued to the Time of Orges; after whom, when his Sons fought to change the legal Government of their Predecessors into Tyranny, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equal. This form of Common-wealth had continuance, with some small changes according to the diversity of Times, till the Reign of Philip and Alexander; Kings of Macedon: who Tempest-like overturned all things in that part of the World. For those twelve Cities, called the Cities of Alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten up a little before the Battle of Leuctra; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a War, no less foolish than cruel, among themselves. But in the one hundred and four and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or near it, Proculus the Son of Lagus, Lyfimachus, Solonus, and Proculus Ceramus, left the World; as the ten remaining Cities and People, namely, the Perseides and the Dimeis, united themselves, and laid the foundation of that general Accord and Reunion, which after followed. For having been, some of them Partisans with sundry Macedonian Captains, and others having been governed by petty Kings, they began to fatten themselves in a strong league of Amity, partly, in the Olympiad, before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first Voyage into Italy. Now after the uniting of the Tarentines and Phars, joyned themselves, Ægea chased out her Garrisons: and the Barians, killing their Kings, entered with the Cerameians into the same Confederacy. These Cities, for twenty and five years, used the same form of Government with the Acheans; who by a Senator and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-wealth; and soon after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Cæmpestis was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who living at Argos in Exile, whilst his Country was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the help of other banished men, to enter their own City by night, with Ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the People to liberty. This was in the Time of Antigonus Gonatas, King of Macedon, a Prince more buie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wife in looking to his own. For fear of Antigonus, the Sicyonians entered into the Achaian League: which though at that time it received more increase, by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction served well enough against Antigonus, whose subtilty was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industry and counsel of Aratus delivered his Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian League: so further, by his great liberality, with the exceeding great cost of one hundred and fifty Talents, he pacified the inexpressible Controversies, between the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those Enterprizes following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The money he obtained of Ptolemy Evergetes, King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure Friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the Conversation of Aratus himself, that made a dangerous Voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly Pictures, with the gift of many curious Pieces, wherein the Workmen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great Attempts, was the Surprise of the Acrocorinthum, or Citadel of Corinth; which which he wan by night, being therein guided by some Thieves that he had hired for the purpose, who living in the Place, had practised to rob Antigonus his Treasury, passing in and out by a secret path among the Rocks. Yet was he fain to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeed he was not, but with those Thieves, who were by Antigonus his Soldiers were rather overcome by their own fear, than by any force of the Assault; as mistrusting lest the Acheans were more in number, than in truth they were, and having lost the advantages of the Place already, upon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any Enemy.

In this kind of Night-services, Ambushments, Surprizes, and Practices, Aratus was very cunning, adventurous, and valiant: in open Field, and plain Battle, he was as timorous. By this strange mixture of Cowardize and Courage, he ministered Argument of Disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might look pale and tremble, when he began Battle; and whether the virtues of Fortitude were diversified, by the sundry natures of men, and in a manner confined, unto several sorts of action. In resolving which Doubts it may be said; that all Virtue is perfected in men by Exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a natural inclination standeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, life, good success, and other help, yet hardly shall grow absolute in general. Such was Aratus in matter of War. In sincere affection to his Country he was unreprieveable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will testify.

When Acrocorinthum was taken, and joyned unto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soon after from Antigonus, and entered into the same Corporation. So did the Trezenians; and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew so powerful, that it adventured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos, and Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The Enterprize upon Athens was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Isle of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athensian Prisoners, without ransom, to allure the City by shew of love, yet the Athensians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now grown honest Slaves to the Macedonians. Upon Argos the Adventure was carried more strongly. The Acheians came sometimes to the Gates of the City, but the People stirred not: once they entered it, and might have won it, if the Citizens would have lent any help to the recovery of their own freedom; and sundry times, and with diverse event, they fought with the Tyrants (who rose up one after another in Argos) in open Field, and slew one in Battle; but all sufficed not: until at length Ariftemachus the Tyrant was so terrified, periwaded, and hired, by Aratus, that he consented to resign his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Philiatians. Whilst this business with the Argives was on foot, Lysidas the Tyrant of Megalopolis was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gave liberty to his City, and annexed it to the Council of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen General of their Forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two years together by one man) every second year, for a certain while, he and Aratus succeeding one another by turns. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lysidas and Ariftemachus, were carried with private passion, from care of the general good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appear in due time.

The Acheians having obtained so much Puffiance and Reputation, that Polemy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of Honour) General of their Forces by Sea and Land, made open War upon Demetrius, the Son of Antigonus Gonatas, for the liberty of Athens. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this Quarrel had lost a Battle, the Athensians were Garlands, in sign of joy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the Victory. Such were now the Athensians become; in whom the Rule was verified, that holds true in general of the multitude, Aut humiliter servit, aut superbe dominatur; it is either base in service, or insolent in command. Nevertheless when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by money which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captain of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased liberty to the Athensians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Acheians; loving them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could do: but into their Corporation they entered not, scorning it belike, in regard of their own out-worn glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by justice and honesty; so did the Ætolians, in the utter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it self, wax very powerful, by sturdiness of body, and rude courage in Fight, without help of any other Virtue. They had stoutly defended themselves against Antigonus and Craterus; partly by daring to do and suffer much; partly by the natural strength and faithfulness of their Country; but especially by the benefit of the time, which, as hath been related, they had molested Caesars, in favour of Antigonus; and were themselves as much plagued by him, and by the Acarnanians, a little, but stout Nation, that took his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the Son of the first Antigonus, and more or less, with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held out War with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were hardened with perpetual travel, seldom putting off their Armour. But their hardiness ill deserved the Name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honesty or friendship; measuring all things by their own insolent will, and thinking all people base minded, that were not as fierce and outrageous as themselves.

These Ætolians had lately made great Spoils in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the Country. They had invaded the Friends of the Acheians; taken and sacked Pallene; where although they were soundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gain made them greedy of a new Voyage thither, as to a Country wherein somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to look another way, by Demetrius the Son of Antigonus Gonatas: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driven to seek help of the Acheians; which they obtained. The War which the Acheians made upon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedonians out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly unto the Ætolians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian Forces diverted from them. Neither was this good turn unacknowledged; though very basely the Ætolians, giving thanks in words, devised how to require the benefit with some great mischief. They law that the Achaean were desirous to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedaemonians were very jealous. Wherefore these Aetolians laboured earnestly to set the Lacedaemonians and Achaean together by the ears: hoping that if this might come to pass, they themselves should be called into help to pass, both in booty and Territory. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their device unto Antigonus, offering to make him partaker of their Gain, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses that his Kingdom had sustained by the Achaean. Of this Plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedaemonians cause to take Arms. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late, and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been meddling with the Aetolians, that were dependants of Lacedaemon, and thereby had provoked the Lacedaemonians to look about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Aetolians their Friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achaean.

The City of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subject to the injuries of any stronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakened it; The Aetolians entering Laconia with an Army, had carried away fifty thousand Slaves; and, which was worse, their Discipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxury reigned among them, the poor was oppressed by the rich, and the generosity of spirit, that had sometime been their general Virtue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than a few hundred natural Citizens, of whom not above one hundred had Lands, all the rest were needy People, and desirous of innovation. Hereupon followed an intestine sedition, which endangered the City most of all. Agis a good King, who fought to reform the disorders of the State, exhorted the People to a strict observation of Lycurgus his Laws. To which purpose he caused them to pass an Act for the abolishing of all Debts, and equal division of Lands. All the younger and the poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse unto Leonidas the other King (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part, being himself a disfigure man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his Wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the City, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his Friends and Counsellors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their own private Commodity. They were hasty to take away all Debts, and cancel Bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted: but the division of Lands they afterwards hindered, because their own Possessions were great. Hence arose a Tumult in Sparta, which these men increased, by their foul oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdom, and the two adverse Kings driven to take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late made King was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into Prison, and there by his Enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-Mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this Cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the Laws, using their Power, and more Power than to them belonged, against a King that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City, as the Laws required.

The Death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens, and served to establish the important rule of a few tyrannical Oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adjoin Lacedaemon to the Achaean Common-wealth, though it were great injustice to take such advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the general good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it self, if it could have been wrought by persuasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did also require the unjust attempts of the Achaean, even in their own kind: obtruding upon them by force, an union of all Peloponnesus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedaemonians and their good liking, for that the Lacedaemonians and their King, should have been the principal; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus revenged Agis to be slain, took his Wife that was veiled rich and beautiful, and gave her in Marriage (perforce) to his own Son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly enamoured on his Wife, and fought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discouraged much with her about the purpose of her former Husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertain a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So coming himself to be King, whilst he was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of War: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an Estate of the City, had attempted to his own ruin. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge to take and fortify Atheneum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended Title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprise Tegæa and Orbomenne, Cities then confederate with the Lacedaemonians: wherein his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painful nights travel, and discovered his enmity to Sparta, of which Cleomenes was nothing sorry. By these degrees the War began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Aetolian practice, and therefore would have staid the Quarrel from proceeding too far. But Lyfias and Ariftemachus would needs fight, and he could do no other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so urgent. Ariftemachus was at that time General of the Achaean (He and Lyfias being of great account, since they had abandoned their Tyranny) who sent unto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his assistance in a Journey to be made into Laconia. No dissuavances of Aratus would serve, therefore he came in person, and took part of a business little pleasing him in the present, and less in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight, but opposed himself against Ariftemachus, who desired to give Battle. Yet had the Achaean twenty thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse in their Army: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedaemonian, and raised an ill report upon Aratus; which Lyfias helped to make worse, by accusing his Cowardize. Nevertheless the Achaean would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their General the year following, against Lyfias his Accuser that lived for the place. Being General himself, it behoved him to confute with deeds, the slanderous words of Lyfias. Therefore he purposed to set upon the

the Eleans: but was met withal on the way, near unto the Mount Lycaeus, by Cleomenes, who vanquished him in a great Battle, and drove him to hide himself all night for fear, so that he was thought to have been slain. This misadventure Aratus recompened by a trick of his own more natural occupation: performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have been expected, had he been victorious. For whilst there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could undertake, he secretly wrought with some of the Manians, who did let him into their City. The Manians had once before joyed themselves with the Achaean; but shortly upon fear, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Aetolians, and from the Aetolians, presently after this Victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their levity they were not punished, but freely admitted now again into the Achaean Society. As this good success repaired the credit of Aratus, so another Battle almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered near unto Megalopolis, where the Achaean had somewhat the better at the first, but their General durst not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lyfias, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger, and taking with him all the Horse, brake upon the Lacedaemonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passages, he was slain by them, and his Followers driven back upon their own Companions, in such fort, that finally all the Army was disordered, and put to flight. This was a great loss, and incensed the Achaean against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution towards the Pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus took patiently, and followed the War nevertheless; wherein, though Cleomenes won some Towns, and Aratus got the better in one final Fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achaean being weary, and the Spartan King intensive to another business.

Cleomenes having led into the Field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painful Journeys, took the Achaean War on a sudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he slew the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient Discipline of Lycurgus. Then gave he an account of his doings, and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroached upon the Power of Kings, and many Disorders had grown in the City; he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by chusing new out of such as were Friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Country might not altogether stand in need of mercenary help, as it lately had done, to save it self from the Aetolians, Illyrians, and other Enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied, and Cleomenes himself ready in the Field, ere his Enemies could take advantage of these his Domestic Troubles.

The Achaean hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the City, for fear of some Rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard that he had wasted all the Country of Megalopolis: had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Maninaea, and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. These news displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to hear words. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the Power of the Ephori, that curbed his Authority, he proceeded more roundly in his work, being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedaemonians retained their ancient courage; and he himself had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth content about the Possession of a few Towns: but adventured to win or lose all. The Aetolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: and whereas he had gotten Maninaea, Tegæa, and other places, to which they had some Tide, they willingly renounced all their interest into him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Country, and saw that Antigonus with the Aetolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begun. Therefore he devised how to provide against the worst, and either to repair all, or (if it could not be) to save all from utter ruin. The Office of General when it was next put upon him, he refused; fearing to be so far preft as to hazard in one Battle all the Force of his Country, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance Courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted by surprise, and depended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, over-charged with numbers of men. Yet he did not forsake the care of the weak publick, though in aiming at the general good, it seems that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazard of Battle; that Maninaea had not only opened her Gates unto Cleomenes, but slain the Achaean Garrison that lay therein; that other Towns had yielded unto him, without compulsion; and that Ariftemachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since General of the Achaean, was now revolted unto the Enemy; following the fortune of Cleomenes. Sparta was too far off to help, and the nearness of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be useful, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, be Friend or Enemy, as should best agree with his own profit. To make trial herof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpose, and instructed them how to deal with both Antigonus, and the Achaean.

The City of Megalopolis had been well affected to the Macedonians, ever since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by some special benefits. At this time it lay nearest unto the danger; was very faithful, and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achaean, with their own proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should be sent unto the general Council of Achaia, requesting leave and good allowance, to try the favour of Antigonus in their necessity. This was granted, for lack of what did to answer: and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their own errand bravely; telling him of the good will and respect which their City had of long time borne unto him and his Predecessors; of their present need, and how it would agree with his Honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more general matter, wherein Aratus had given them instruction, shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Aetolians, might redound to his own great loss or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himself did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaean under the Pa-tragnage of Macedon: then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their discourse. He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help should not be wanting, so far forth, as it might stand with the Achaean good liking. Particularly he commended himself, by these Messengers to Aratus; assuring them, that he thought himself highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to have been grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a just and worthy love to his own Nation. With this answer they return to Megalopolis: and are presently sent away to the Council of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required.

The Achaean were glad to hear that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; and therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his consent, and praised the Wisdom of his Country-men, that so well discerned the best and likeliest means of their common safety: adding nevertheless, that it were not amiss, first of all to try their own ability; which if it failed, then should they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himself moderate; in that which himself of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustain the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amiss, since it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leisurely, the general consent.

Nevertheless, in true estimation, this fineness of Aratus might have been used, with his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had been more honourable to make an end of the War, by yielding unto Cleomenes that Power which they gave unto Antigonus: since thereby he should both have freed his Country from all further trouble; and withal, should have restored unto the universal State of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pity) that Vertue having risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it self (as it were) in the seat of Principality, by length of time, and success of many actions; can ill endure the hasty growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it self likely to be over-topped. Other cause to despise the Lacedaemonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himself more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was justly plagued, when he saw his own Honours reversed by the insolent Macedonians; and instead of living as a Companion with Cleomenes, that was defended of a long Race of Kings, the Posterity of Hercules, was fain to do sacrifice unto Antigonus as unto a God, and was finally poisoned by Philip, whose Nobility was but of five descents, and whom perhaps he might have seen his Fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the Love of Polomy was lost: who forthwith took part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberality as he had used to the Achaean; being warned, as may seem by their example, to be more wary, both in trusting and discharging. Cleomenes himself, whilst this business with Antigonus was a foot, passed through Arcadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Achaean to Battle. At the City of Dyme in Achaia were assembled all the remaining Forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make trial, whether perhaps they might amend their Estate, without seeking help of the Macedonians. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where he had to great a Victory, that the Enemy was no longer able to keep the open Field. The Calamity was such, that Aratus himself durst not take upon him to be their General, when his turn came in the next Election. Wherefore the Achaean were compelled to sue for Peace; which was granted upon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate unto themselves the Command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedaemonians (as in former Ages) to be their Leaders in War. Hereunto, if they would condescend, he promised unto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his Prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Achaean, who desired him to come unto the City of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held for the conclusion of the War.

Now seemed the Affairs of Greece likely to be settled in better order than they had ever been since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Wars, yea, or since the Persian Invasion, when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindered all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in a great heat, and thereupon fell extrem sick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheless he sent home the chief of his Prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good Faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Achaean in their desire of his Friendship: who assembled again at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it, and fought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Country-men afraid of resolving. When all would not serve turn, he betook himself to his cunning, and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos, receiving Hostages for safety of his Person. Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this advertisement: and took it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had been an easie matter to have told him so much at the first, and not have made him come so far with an Army, which afterwards he must dismiss. Yet that which chiefly seems to have troubled him, was the drift of his Oppugners, who fought thereby, either to make him wait without the Gates, and deal only with themselves and their Messengers; or if he would adventure himself into the City, then to deprive him of all Royal shew, that might breed respect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, and for which he sought to hinder his coming thither in person, lest the People hearing the Promises of Cleomenes ratified by his own mouth, should presently be won with his gentle words, and finish the Bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Council, bitterly complaining against these juggling tricks: and Aratus was not far behind with him, in as bitter an Oration. So between fear of the one, and reverence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all as it were to Fortune. Cleomenes took his advantage of their present weakness, and renewed the War. Many Cities yielded unto him willingly, many he forced, and partly by force, partly by terror, he won

Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could do. In this case Aratus sent his own Son to Antigonus, entreating him to defer no time, but come presently to relieve the distressed Achaean. Antigonus gave as good words as could be wished: saying that he utterly refused to do any thing, unless he might first have Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demand was somewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promised to help the Horse against his Enemy the Stag: but with condition, that the Horse should suffer himself to be felled and bridled. Aratus was herewithal contented, but wanted all honest colour to do it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deserved to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found, for that the Corinthians perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himself out of their City, and sent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ran to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he sought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to save it from Antigonus, by surrounding it with Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leave. Whilst this was in doing, he took special order that Aratus his House and Goods within the Town, should be safely kept for the Owner, to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians and Hyrians to Peloponnesus: promising that if he would hearken to these persuasions, then would he give him double the fine Pension, which he had been wont to receive of King Ptolemy. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the Gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured Sovereignty of the Country; he desired that it might not be committed unto his own disposition, but be joyfully kept by the Lacedaemonians and Achaean. All this entreaty served to no purpose. For Aratus rejecting utterly the motion, sent his own Son as an Hostage to Antigonus, and laboured with the Achaean to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes understood, he sailed upon the Goods of Aratus in Corinth, and waited all the Country of Sicion, whereof this his Adversary was native.

Antigonus in the mean time drew near to the Illyrians; having passed with his Army through Euboea, because the Atolians held the Straights of Thermopylae against him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatness, whereunto the Macedonians might attain by the good success of this Journey. At his coming thither he found the Lacedaemonians ready to forbid his entrance, and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazard battle, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force, but he was not able so to do: he secretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out again, with great loss of men; finally, he resolved to turn aside, and seek a passage over the Gulf of Corinth, to Sicion, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity news from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no less troubled his Enemies. The Achaean were gotten into that City; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left there, though it was not driven out of the Citadel, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present help. Argos had always been Enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it, he forbore to chafe out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of Friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his Victory, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all Debtors to be discharged that their Creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would have been tyrannical, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turn their backs upon him, and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not do the like abroad. So they took their time, invited the Achaean, assisted his Garrison, cut in pieces the Refuge that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the defence of Corinth, and look unto the Enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood, by continual Messengers, that his men which held the Citadel at Argos were almost lost; he began to fear, left his labour in guarding the entry, should grow frivolous; the Achaean in the mean while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsook the custody of the Illyrians, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he could save, he meant to trust Fortune with the rest. And so far he prevailed at his coming to Argos; that both Argives and Achaean were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the Streets: when the Horse-men of Antigonus were discovered a far off, halting to relieve the Citizens, and Antigonus himself (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soon as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, than to make a safe retreat. This he did, and got him home into Laconia, losing in short space all, or most of that which he had been long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himself at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he took his way to Argium, where was held a Parliament by the Achaean: to whom he declared the cause of his coming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Achaean were not behind with him, but made him Captain General over them and their Confederates, and further entered into Covenant with him, that they should not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassage, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man that seemed to rule the Kings heart: the only man that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicion his own Town (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane Honours, as sacrifices, and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if instead of Cleomenes that would have been a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poor, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Achaean. This was hardly taken, yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himself over-carefully respected, when the Statues of those Tyrants, which he had thrown down in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the Statues which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all thrown down by the same King, and one only left.

left unto himself at his earnest entreaty. It might therefore appear, that this God was also fighful. Nevertheless in taking revenge upon those that offended him, Aratus did fastise his own passion by the aid of these Macedonians. For with extrem Torments he did put Arifomachus to death, who had been once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards General of the Achaens; and from them revolting unto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantineans, for their Ingratitude and Cruelty shewed to the Achaens. For he slew all the principal Citizens, and fold the rest, Men, Women, and Children, all for Bond-slaves: dividing the Spoil; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achaens. The Town it self was given by Antigonus to the Argives; who peopled it with a Colony of their own; and Aratus having charge of this business, caused it to be now-named Antigonia. Surety of this Cruelty there can be no better excuse, than even the Flattery, which Aratus was driven to use to Antigonus: forasmuch as it was a token of Servility, wherunto they had urged and brought him; whilst he, as in revenge thereof, did thus requite. But leaving to speak of this change, which the coming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Civil state of the Achaens, let us return unto his War against the Lacedaemonians.

The next Summer Antigonus with Tegae, Mantineae, Orchomenus, Helae, and Tegea. Mantineae he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achaens, with whom he wintered at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his own Territory. The reason why he fitted no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantineae, and to those other Towns that he wan, was this: He had few Souldiers, and not money enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Ægyptian promised much, but would perform nothing, unless he might have Cleomenes his own Mother, and his Children in pledge. These were sent into Ægypt; yet the Aid came not. For Ptolemy was slow; as dealing in the business of Greece, rather for his minds sake, than upon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himself, as well as his own ability would serve. He manumitted all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedaemonian Slaves: taking money for their liberty, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his Forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis, that lay secure, as having defended it self in more dangerous Times, and having now Antigonus near at hand in Ægium. The Town he wan: but after he was entered, all that were fit to bear Arms, rose hastily against him; and though they could not drive him out, yet saved the multitude, to whom they gave a Port free for their escape. He sent to them again, if they would be of his Party. But they bravely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great Booty that he found therein. These News afforded the Achaens at Ægium: who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering Places: but they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their Lodgings, and went himself to Argos, there to pass the rest of this unlucky Winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Achaens. When he had layn a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the Gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argives perceiving that their Countrey would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the Field, were very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he was wiser, than to be moved with their Clamour; and suffered them to see their Villages burnt; to bid him resign his Office of Protector; unto some that were more valiant; and to fastise their passions with foolish words, rather than he would be overcome in Fight, and thereby lose more Honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakening the Reputation of his Enemy: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength, unto Lacedaemon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for War, Antigonus gathered together all his Troops, meaning to requite these Bravado's of his Enemy, with the Conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keep the War from his own Gates; and therefore entered upon the Countrey of Argos, where he made such havoc, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended Invasion of Laconia. Many great Affronts the Macedonian was fain to endure, in coasting the Spartan King; that ranging over the Countrey of the Argives, Philiatians, and Orchomenians, drove a Garrison of his out of Oligyria; and did sacrifice, as it were before his face, in the Suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Juno, that was shut up; sending unto him in scorn, to borrow the Keys. These were light things; yet served to dishearten the Achaen side, and to fill the Enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard, of things abroad, and to put all to hazard, by setting up his rest, without more delay, upon Sparta it self. He had in his Army eight and twenty thousand Foot, and twelve hundred Horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Thyrians, Gauls, Spartans, Boetians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achaens, and their Friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twenty thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seek entrance. Antigonus coming to Selasia, found his Enemy so strongly incamped, upon and between the Hills of Eos and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blows, which he greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Army, in affaying their well-defended Camp. But at length (as it happens, when men are weary both of their hopes and fears) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other, Antigonus attempted with his Thyrians, to force that part which lay on the Hill Eos: but his Thyrians were so ill seconded by the Achaen Foot, that the Spartan Horse, and light-armed Foot, incamped in the freight Valley between those Hills, issuing forth, fell upon their skirts; and not only disordered them, but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himself had stood in that part of the Battle, he would have made great use of such a fair beginning. But Eucledis, his Brother, a more valiant than skilful Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this advantage, nor took such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopemen the Arcaidian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proved a famous Captain, served then on Horse, as a private young man, among the Achaens. He seeing that all was like to go to rout, if their Thyrians were driven to fall back upon the Army following them, perfwaded the Captains of the Achaen Horse, to break upon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth, and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they should keep their Places, until they received a sign from him, which was not as yet. Philopemen perceiving them to be more orderly, than well advised, entreated some of his own Countreymen to follow him; gave a charge upon the Spartans; and forced them not only to leave the Thyrians, but seek how to save themselves. Being so far advanced, he found the Place which the Thyrians had attempted, like enough to be won, through the unskilfulness of him that held it. Wherefore he alighted, and perfwaded the men at Arms his Companions to do the like: the folly of Eucledis being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and fired not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plain, where they might fight upon even terms. So he recovered the Hill top; where though he was fore hurt, yet he made good the Place that he had gotten, until the whole Army came up to him; by which the Lacedaemonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This overthrow, and death of Eucledis, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting bravely on the other side, upon Olympus, against Antigonus himself, was like to have been surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawn himself with an extraordinary speed. In this Battle, ended the glory of Lacedaemon; which, as a Light ready to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many Ages past.

Cleomenes fled unto Sparta: where he had no desire to fly, finding only two hundred left, of six thousand Spartans that he had led into this Battle, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perfwaded his people to yield themselves unto Antigonus; and promising to do all that should at any time lye in his own power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had Shipping long before provided, against all that might happen) and imbarqued himself for Ægypt. He was lovingly entertained by Ptolemy Evergetes; who undertook to restore him to his Kingdom; and (perhaps) meant no less, as being much delighted with his gallant Behaviour and Qualities. In the mean season he had a Pension allowed him, of four and twenty Talents, yearly. But this Ptolemy died; and his Son Ptolemy Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women, and base Men, unmindful of all Virtue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to return into Greece, whither the Troubles in Peloponnesus did seem to invite him, Ptolemy, and his Minions, would neither give him aid, nor yet dared to dismiss him (as he desired) to try his own Friends in Greece, because he was too well acquainted with the weakness of Ægypt: nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they devised matter against him, and made him Prisoner. The last act of him was; that with thirty of his Countreymen, he undertook a desperate Enterprize: breaking out of the Prison, and provoking the Alexandrines to rebel, and seek their liberty. In which Attempt, he slew some Enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and down the Streets, without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the King's behalf) He, and his Companions, agreed together to be

Ministers of their own Death. Upon his dead Body Philopater was bold to shew his Indignation: and slew his Mother and Children, that had been sent thither as Hostages, together with the Wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending upon the old Queen. Such was the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grandmother, to come to such a bloody end, as now belet his own Wife, Son, and Grandchildren.

After the Victory at Selasia, Antigonus without resistance entered Sparta: wherewith never the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly entreated the Citizens, and left them to their own Laws and Government: carrying there no longer, than two or three days; after which he hasted out of Peloponnesus, and never returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an Advertisement that he received out of Macedon; how the Thyrians over-ran, and destroyed the Countrey. Had these News come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the Fight, a few days longer, or at least-way tarried, a few days after the Fight, in Sparta, the Kingdom of Lacedaemon would have stood, and perhaps have extended it self over all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great Battle with the Thyrians, and overcame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by over-straining his voice; wherewith he brake a Vein that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his Life, who was troubled before with a Consumption of the Lungs. His Kingdom descended unto Philip, the Son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, firnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolemy Philopater, began to reign in Asia, and Ægypt; Boys all. Of these, Ptolemy, though old enough to love Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seventeen years of his Reign. The unripe Age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconvenience to their Kingdoms, as is usual in the minority of Princes: but their elder years brought them acquainted with the Romans; upon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speak of them, and of their Kingdoms, more at large.

How the Thyrians invaded the Coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

WILKIN things thus passed in Greece; and whilst the Carthaginians were busy in their conquest of Spain, the Romans had found themselves work among the Sardinians and Corsicans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished again, when they rebelled. They made all war with the Thyrians, wherein they got much Honour with little pain. With the Gauls they had much ado, that lasted not long; being rather, as Livy saith, a Tumult than a War. So that by Livy, all these light Exercises, their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea, it hath been shewed before: of their dealings with the Thyrians and Gauls; it is not meet to be utterly silent.

The Thyrians inhabited the Countrey, now called Slovenia: a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making War for gain, without other regard of Friend or Foe. They were invited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to help the

Eccc

Mydi

Mydonians, his Friends, that were besieged by the Ætolians, for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrian Succours came, the Mydonians were so far spent, that the Ætolians contended about the Booty: the old Prætor, or chief Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, claiming to have the honour of the Victory, and the division of the Spoil to be referred unto him; for that he had in a manner brought the Siege to an end, and won the Town: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old Orders might be kept. It was a pretty strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later Ages, who thought upon dividing the Prey, before they had won the Victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and at Agincourt. The Ætolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, should be jointly entitled in the Victory, and have equal Authority, in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell upon the Ætolians; and though good resistance was made, yet got the Victory, partly by force of their own multitude, partly by help of the Mydonians, that were not idle in their own business, but stoutly fell out of the Town. Many of the Ætolians were slain, more were taken, their Camp and all their Baggage was lost: the Illyrians took the Spoil, and went their way; the Mydonians erected a Trophy, inscribing the Names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The success of this Voyage, highly pleased Agan King of the Illyrians: not only in regard of the money, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that having vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not uneasy, to enrich himself by setting upon the less warlike. For joy of this, he feasted, and drank so immoderately, that he fell into a Pleurisy, which in few days ended his life. His Kingdom, together with his great hopes, he left unto Tuta, his Wife.

Tuta gave her people free liberty to rob all Nations at Sea, making no difference between Friend and Foe; as if he had been sole Mistress of the great Waters. She armed a Fleet, and sent it into Greece: willing her Captains, to make War where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell with the Western Coast of Peloponnesus; where they invaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and layed at the City of Phœnice, to take in Victuals and other Necessaries. There lay in Phœnice eight hundred Gauls; that having been Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Argenrium, then Erys, to the Romans; but failing to do either, they nevertheless revolted, and were for their misdeeds disarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirians, and trusted to lie in Garrison within their Town. The Gauls were soon grown acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phœnice; which delivered none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in Arms, and halfted to drive out these unwelcom Guests. But whilst the Epirians lay before the Town, there came News into their Camp, of another Illyrian Army, that was marching thitherward by Land, under one Scerdilaidas; whom Queen Tuta had sent to help his fellows. Upon this Advertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigenia, to make good that Town, and the streights adjoining, by which these newcomers must enter into their Country; another part of them remains at Phœnice, to continue the siege. Neither the one nor the other sped well in their business. For Scerdilaidas found means to join with his fellows; and they that were besieged within Phœnice, fell out of the Town, and gave such an overthrow to the Epirians, as made them despair of saving their Country, without great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadors were sent to the Acheans and Ætolians; craving their help, with very piteous terms of entreaty. They obtained their suit: neither was it long, before an Army, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus, to prevent battle unto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home, by Letters from Tuta the Queen, that signified a Rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no mind to put his Forces to hazard, but offered composition; which was accepted. The Agreement was, That the Epirians might ransom their Town, and all their people that were Prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their booty and slaves. Having made this profitable and honourable bargain, the Illyrians returned into their own Country by Land, sending their booty away by Sea.

At their coming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this Voyage. For in fulfilling the Commandment of their Queen, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilst they lay at Phœnice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complainants made unto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadors were sent to require of Tuta, that she should abstain from doing such injuries. These Embassadors found her very joyful; both for the riches which her Fleet had brought in, and for that she had, in those forces, raised her Rebels, and brought all to good order, save only the Town of Lissa, which her Forces held freighly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, he could hardly afford a good look to the unmannerly Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true Name, Pirates, required amends. Yet when their Speech was ended, she vouchsafed to tell them, That injury in publick the would do them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings, to forbid their Subjects to get Commodity, how they best could, by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadors) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take Revenge in publick, of those private Wrongs, that are born out by publick Authority: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reform your Kingly manners, and learn better of us. These Words the Queen took so impatiently, that no revenge could satisfy her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the Common Law of Nations, the caused him to be slain: as if that had been the way to set her heart at rest; which was indeed the mean to disquiet and afflict it ever after.

The Romans, provoked by this out-rage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred Sail, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Popthimus. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring satisfaction, for this injury is of such nature, as must be required with mortal War. It is indeed contrary to all humane Law, to use violence towards Embassadors: the reason and ground whereof, seems to be this; that since without mediation, there would never be an end of war and destruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadors should pass freely, and in safety between Enemies. Nevertheless, as I take it, this general Law is not without limitation. For if any King, or State, lay hold upon Embassadors sent by their Enemies, not unto themselves, but unto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrel; then is it as lawful, to use violence to those Embassadors (thus employed, to make the War more terrible) as it is to kill the men of War, and Subjects, of an Enemy. And so might the Athenians have answered it, when they flew the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a war upon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadors, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law whatsoever. For whereas the true Office of an Ambassador residing is the maintenance of Amity; if it be not lawful for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much less may an Ambassador do it, without incurring justly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place gives him no privilege at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Greeks; and go on with the revenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadors Comacenus.

The Illyrian Queen was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was indeed in an error; that hath undone many of all sorts, greater and less than she, both before and since: Having more regard unto fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greeks were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirians had the Name of the most warlike people in Greece; she had the easily vanquished; and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Army, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; and that nevertheless, it prevailed as much, by odds of Number, as by Valour, or skill in Arms; that the world have continued to use her advantage against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her self. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like commission, to take all that could be gotten. This fleet divided it self; and one part of it fell with Dyrachium; the other, with Coryra. Dyrachium was almost surprised by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In Coryra the Illyrians landed; wasted the Isle, and besieged the Town. Hereupon the Ætolians and Acheans were called in to help: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; losing, besides others of less note, Marcus Cæpensis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Town of Coryra, disarmed with this Overthrow, opened the gates unto Demetrius Pharicus; who took possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrachium. In the mean season, Tuta was angry with her Captain Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to try any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were even ready to put to Sea, though uncertain which way to take, when advertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consul, of Demetrius his fear and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly help to advance the business in hand. Wherefore the Consul failed thither; where he found the Town of Coryra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it was only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and subverted it self unto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Consul failed along the coast, to Apollonia; accompanied with Apollonia, Demetrius, whom he tied thenceforth as his counsellor and guide. To Apollonia came also Popthimus, the other Consul, with the Land-Army, numbered at twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but upon news of the Roman Army, they disperse themselves. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea; take Twenty of their Ships; and enforce the Queen Tuta to forsake the coast, and to cover her self in Rijon, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leave the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part stays behind, and prosecutes the War, in such sort, that Tuta was forced to beg peace; which she obtained upon miserable Conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay Tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth, never send any of her Ships; or War, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Island of Lissa: except it were some one or two Vessels, unarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian War, the Romans sent Embassadors into divers parts of Greece, signifying their love to the Country, and how, for good will thereto, they had made War with good success upon Tuta, and her people. They hoped belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wiser enough to play their own games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadors were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Libinian pastimes. This was an idle courtesy, but well meant by the vain Greeks, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little Acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the War between the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italy.

THE Gauls that dwelt in Lumbaria, were the next, against whom the Romans took Arms. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their own forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they took Rome; and burnt it: though the issue of that War proved not unprofitable to the beginning, if we may give credit unto Roman Historians. In following times, their success was variable, and commonly bad. Many Overthrows they received; and if they got any Victory, it yielded them no profit, but was soon extorted out of their hands. They were indeed more fierce, than well advised: lightly stirred up to War, and lightly giving over. At the first brunt, they were laid to be more than men; but when that was past, less than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience; and knew how to handle them:

a Dyrrachium, a time called Dyrrachium, and now Dyrrachio, of upon the Adriatic Sea, between the Islands of Phœnice and Coryra, b Coryra, an Island of the Achaia, c Coryra, the city of the Phœnicians.

yet gave always careful heed to their approach, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was sudden and uncertain; by reason of their Neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their Attempts upon Rome, were called Wars, but tumultuous Gallies; tumults of the Gauls; and rightly. For they gave many alarms to Italy, and used to march with great Armies: but after a few days march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion they to disperse them. Having received an Overthrow; they would retreat ten or twelve years, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred up again, by younger heads, unacquainted with the danger. Whilst they rested, the state of Rome, that against these made only defensive War, had leisure to grow, by setting upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchy, which he intended to raise: that the Gauls never fell upon Italy, with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous War. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilst Pyrrhus was travelling in the same enterprise, or in either of the two former Punick Wars; it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious City. But it seems that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affairs of Italy, than strangers had in Gaul. At least, they knew not how to use their times: and were therefore like to snare, whenever the Enemies, which they had much provoked, and little hurt, should find leisure to visit them at their own home: which was now after the first Punick War. Once before this, the Romans had been bold, to set upon the Gauls in their own Country: and that was three years before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italy. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Hetruria, and besieging Arretium, had won a great battle, and slain L. Cæcilius with the most of his Army. Manius Curius the new Consul, sent Embassadors to them, to treat about ransom of Prisoners. But these Embassadors they slew. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Country, and sent a Colony of their own to inhabit it. This caused the Boii; another people of Gauls, to fear the measure: who thereupon took Arms, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battles; and thereby made them sue for peace, which lasted until this end of the Illyrian war.

e There were divers Nations of the Boii; as in Pannonia, Elvira, Germany, in Barbis in France, and in Aquitania: but these Boii were of the French race, and dwell at this time about the mouth of the River of Po.

It vexed the Gauls, to see a Roman Colony planted in their Country; who had been accustomed to enlarge their bounds; by driving out their Neighbours: perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpinæ (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alps; though to us they are nearer; like as they called Cisalpinæ, or by-further the Alps, those who dwelt between them and the Mountains) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their disjunction had caused their loss, to their union might recompence it, with large amends. But the business was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpinæ and Transalpinæ, fell together by the ears: putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of War. Soon after they were urged by a greater indignity, to go more substantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, propounded a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would serve to people the whole Country between Arretium and Ariminum: terminating utterly those Gauls. Such an Offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Gutinus it self, would not convey the Multitude. But the Commonality of Rome took this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadful President extremely displeased the Boii: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displacement. And because all the rest of the Gauls had reason to resolve, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchy of Milan, joyned with the Boii, and upon a common prey entertained the Gellates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Swissers in these times. The Gellates having received a great Impulse, came to the Field under the conduct of their Kings, Comelitanus and Aneroelphus: who with the Boii and Insubrians, compound an Army of Fifty thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that ever invaded the Roman Territory; to whom, the Senogallii, that had been beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the Cenomani, adhered to the Romans: as better believing in their prosperity and rising fortune. For fear of whole incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leave a good part of their Army, on the frontier of Milan: With the rest of their forces they entered into Tuscanæ. The Romans hearing of this danger, sent Æmilius to Rimini, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Consul, who then was in Sardinia, they implored one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuscanæ.

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the consideration of this powerful Army, which the Gauls had assembled, they caused a view to be taken, as well of all their own forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no less willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their own destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, being in this Muster, deserve to be recorded; because they set out the power of the Romans in those days. With the Consuls, they sent forth the War four Legions of their own; every Legion consisting of five thousand two hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse; and of their Allies, thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians, fifty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse; which Army was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria.

Of the Umbri and Samnites, which inhabited the Apennines, there were twenty thousand; of the Venetians and Cenomani, other twenty thousand: which latter Armies were directed to invade the Boii, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the general Army of the Gauls should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to be ready against all uncertain chances of War, thirty thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, garrison'd in Rome it self, of their own people; and of their Allies, thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. Over and above these great Troops, in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent into the Senate, there were numbered fourscore thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse; in that of the Samnites, twenty thousand Foot, and of Horse seven thousand; in that of the Volturni, and Malappes, fifty thousand Foot, and fifteen thousand Horse; the Lucani sent Sardinia, lands at Pisa; so as the Gauls, inclosed between two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Rear and Front. To furnish Amilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milavus; in the Front, they range the Piemontois, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting upon the River of Po. The manner of the Fight Polypius describeth at large, which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and so did Attilius the Consul: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Conciliatus and Anercifus, with forty thousand of their Vassals.

After this fatal overthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italy. For they were invaded the year following this Overthrow, by the new Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to use their Victory: they gave not ten, twenty, or thirty years time to the Gauls, to repair their forces, as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Boii; but by reason of the great Rains that fell, and the great Fertility that reigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second year, Enrius, and Flamininus, invade the Milavus; and prevail very far, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanni and the Veneti. Nevertheless these Consuls were revoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resign their Office: because the Angures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their divination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not only fore-shewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the Election. C. Flamininus, receiving letters of this revocation, from the Senate, and being otherwise advertised of the Contents, was not hasty to open them: but first gave battle unto the Enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Country; then perused the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobility.

This was that Flamininus, who had propounded the Decree, for dividing the Country of the Sennos among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that understanding the Majesty of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegation, or grand Commission; did not stand highly upon his Birth and Degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and use their power, over himself, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the furer side: and found imitators, that rose by the same Art; which in process of time, grew the only or chief way to preferment.

Flamininus and his Colleague, being deposed; M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consuls for the rest of that year. The Gauls, about this time desired peace, and were like to have obtained it; though the new Consuls were against it, as fearing to want work. But when thirty thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come over the Alpes, and joyined with the Insubrians: all other discourse, than of present War, was at an end: So the Consuls hasted into their Province, where they besieged Acerra, a Town not far from Novara (so far had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchy of Adrian. To divert them from this Siege, Britomarus fate down before Clasidium, a Town in the same Tract, with great part of his forces; leaving the rest with the Insubrians, to attend upon the Consuls at Acerra, and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans break up their Siege: Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the Horse, and six Hundred Foot lightly armed; thought to deal well enough with those at Clasidium. Britomarus heard of the Consuls coming; and met him upon the way; so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their journey, but were compelled instantly to fight. Herein Britomarus had done well; if he had not forthwith, in a rash bravery, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number, both of Horse and Foot: but he thought so well of his own personal valour, that he rode out single before his Army, provoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no less daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slew and disarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his own men took such courage, and his Enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight, the Romans obtained a great Victory.

This was the third and last time, that ever any Roman General slew the General of the Enemies with his own Hand. To this kind of Victory belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cicero, and this Marcellus had the Honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipio's, and divers other Roman Captains, especially Cæsar, were better men of War than any of these three; though they never offered up to Jupiter, Optima Volua; The Armour of a General slain by himself, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected so to do.

After this Victory, Acerra was yielded to the Romans, and Adrian soon after; with all that belonged to the Cisalpinus or Gauls, that dwelt in Lombardy. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had for so many years vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the City itself, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territory possit by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italy, so many as would not submit their Necks to the Roman Yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountains, like Outlaws and Thieves. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twenty years, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed up the Temple of Janus: which they never did before, (it standing always open, when they had any War, save once, in the Reign of Numa; nor in long time after, until the Reign of Augustus. But this their present Happiness was not to last long: a dangerous War, and perhaps the greatest that had ever been, was to come unto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchy as far as their ambition could reach.

Of the second Punic War.

§. I.

The Wars of Hannibal in Spain. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besieged and taketh Saguntum; whilst the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. War proclaimed between Rome and Carthage.

Hannibal, the Son of Amilcar, was about six and twenty years old, when he was chosen General of the Carthaginian Forces in Spain. He was elected by the Army as soon as Adrubal was dead: and the Election was ratified by the State at Carthage; wherewith Hannibal and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine Family (so called of Amilcar, whose Surname was Barcar) that had command in chief, over the Men of War. Which honour would perhaps have been less envied by these domestical Enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine House, had not also born the whole sway in Government, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the People. This general Good-will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilcar, in saving his Country from imminent ruin, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with Treasures and great Revenues; so was it retained by the same good Arts among his Friends and Followers. Hence therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to tax the virtue of their Enemies, that was unprovable, nor to perform the like services unto the Common-weal, had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the general reprehension of War, and cautious advice of not provoking the Romans. This they seasoned other whiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine Faction went about to oppress the Liberty of the City. But their malicious words were unregarded; and if it were tedious to hear ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no less Barchine than Hannibal himself. For it was long since apparent, that the Oath of the Romans to the Articles of Peace, afforded no security to Carthage, were the never so quiet and officious, unless the would yield to become their Subject. Since therefore the Peace was like to hold no longer, than until the Romans could find some good advantage, to renew the War: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilst their own State was in good case, the War should begin, than that in some unhappy time of Famine or Pestilence, or after some great loss of Army or Fleet, they should be driven to yield unto the impudent demands of their Enemies; and to give away basely their Lands and Treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, upon terms of disadvantage.

This disposition of his Countreymen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he ignorant (for his Father, and other Friends, had long time deviled of this business) that in making War with the Romans, it was so small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Army into Italy, without molestation, there was good hope that he should find Friends and Assistants, even of those People that helped to increase the Roman Armies in foreign Wars. But this could never be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how farsoever they would be, to hear that he had led the War on foot, would nevertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great Enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not only with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discovered of, in procuring allowance to his design. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege unto Saguntum, which might seem not greatly to concern the Romans, and would highly please the Carthaginians; who, that had fresh in mind the indignity of that Spanish Towns alliance with their false Friends. So should he assuage both the patience of his Enemies, and the disposition of his own Citizens.

Having thus concluded, he nevertheless went fair and orderly to work: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approached unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Livy) to give some colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the War against Saguntum, but had been drawn thither by course of business. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needful to finish the Conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should provoke the Romans. First therefore he entered upon the Territory of the Olcades, * A People having besieged Althea (Livy calleth it Carthago) ple (saith Stephanus) near the River of Ebro, Puro detook, being subdued, and the Winter at hand, in he refted his Army in New Carthage, or Carthago, and imparted liberally to the Soldiers, the Spoils he had gotten in his late Conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the War against the Vaccæ; and without any great difficulty, won first Salamanca, now called Salamanca, and after it, Arbucala, by assault: though not without a long Siege, and great difficulty. But in his return, he was put to the hazard, both of his Courage, and of his Martial Judgment. For all such of the Vaccæ, as were able to bear Arms, being made desperate by the spoil of their Country, with those of Salamanca, and of the Olcades, that had escaped in the late Overthrow, joining themselves with the Toletani; compounded an Army of an hundred thousand able men; and stayed Hannibal on the Banks of the River Tagu, which runneth to the Sea by Liborn in Portugal. Vaccæ in These four Nations having had experience of Aras, * Arbucala, or Althea, an Inn of the City of Carthago.

Hannibals

Hannibal's invincible Courage, and that he never fear Enemy, upon whom he durst not give charge, were thoroughly relieved, that his natural Valour would at this time no less neglect the cold advice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to do, when the like great occasion perfwaded him to use it. But he that makes himself a body of Cryftal, that all men may look through him, and difcern all the parts of his difpofition; makes himself (withal) an As: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drive him. Wife men, though they have fingle hearts in all that is juft and vertuous, yet they are like Coffers with double bottoms: which when others look into, being opened, they fee not all that they hold, on the fudden, and at once. It is true, that this fubtil Carthaginian, when he ferv'd under Adrubal, was of all the men of mark in the Army, the moft adventurous. But that which may befeem a Captain, or inferior Commander, doth not always become a Chief, though it hath fometimes fucceeded well with fuch great ones, as have been found more fortunate than wife. At this time, our great Man of War knew, as well how to diffeemble his Courage, as at other times to make it good. For he withdrew himself from the River fide, as if fearful to ford it, thereby to draw over that great Multitude from their Banks of advantage: the Spaniards apprehending this in fuch fort, as Hannibal desired that they should, thrust themselves in fury and diforder into the swift Stream, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for fear) the defences on the contrary fide. But when Hannibal faw them in their way, and well-near over, he turned back his Elephants, to entertain them at their landing, and thrust his Horse-men both above and beneath them, into the River. These, carrying a kind of Lance de gay, sharp at both ends, which they held in the midst of the Staff; had fuch an advantage over the Foot that were in the River under their strokes, clattered together, and unable to move or shift their Bodies, as on firm ground, that they flew all thofe (in a manner) without resistance, which were already entred into the Water, and purfued the rest, that fled like men amazed, with fo great a laughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard on that fide the River of Iberus (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift up their hands againft the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines perceiving the danger towards them, cryed before they were hurt. They fent Embassadors to Rome, and bemoaned themselves, as likely to fuffer that, which afterwards they fuffered indeed, only becaufe of their Alliance and Friendship with this honorable City, which the Carthaginians hated. This Tale moved the Senate, but much more a report that Saguntum was already befieged. Hereupon fome cry out, that War should be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as also that the two Consuls should be fent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Affick. But others went more Roman-like to work, and carried it. So it was only concluded, that Embassadors should be fent into Spain, to view the State of the Confederates: which were indeed none other than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended War againft Rome, it was likely that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take Arms againft him: if he had no fuch purpose, yet would it be in their Power, to determine what they lifted themselves; upon the report of these Embassadors, and this their Gravity, in being not too rash at first, would serve to countertain their following Decree. Of these Embassadors Livy reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum; but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Plutarch, an Historian of sincerity less questionable, tells, that they found him at Carthage, and had conference with him, though fuch as left them doubtful. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal's whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptory Embassage (as Livy confefsed) and fall to difputation about the Covenants of Peace; if they had rejected that which was fent upon none other pretence, than prevention of War.

Whilst the Embassadors passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his Forces, but some Roman pretences againft Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or People that should do as the Mamertines in Sicily had done for the Romans; and implore his help againft the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani, a Nation adjoining to Saguntum, and having many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal himself had hatched some. Finding therefore fuch an occasion, whatsoever it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first provoked him, ere he meddled with them; he made no more ado, but fate down with his whole Power before their Town. He was now more secure, than he had formerly been, of his own Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Ambassadors, with any trembling reverence, as of late years they had been wont. Nevertheless, he was glad of any handsome colour to shadow his actions: not only becaufe the War, which he fo much desired, was not proclaimed, but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open Enemy, before he could feet foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the Quarrel: as hoping that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their own. Yet were they not hasty to threaten, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize until they had an Army in readiness to be fent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum the Seat of the War.

In the mean while, Demetrius Phlorinus, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled againft them: either for that he found himself over-freightly roused up by them, with hard conditions; or rather becaufe he was of an unthankful disposition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward the Fame of the Carthaginian War, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons, whom he ought to have defended and aided in all Perils, even with the hazard of his whole Estate, which he had received of their Gift. But he was a Traitor to his own Queen; and therefore dealt according to his kind, with thofe that had rewarded him for being fuch. First, he built Ships, and spoiled the Illes of Greece: againft the Covenants to which he was bound. Then he adventured further, and fifted upon some places that the Romans kept in their own hands. If he had begun fooner, or rather if he had flayed somewhat longer, he might have fped better. For the business with the Gauls was ended, with Hannibal not thoroughly begun, when he declared himself, by his doings, an Enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Emilius, was fent against him: who in seven days wan the strong Town of Dimalum, and thereby brought fuch terror upon the Country round about, that Embassadors were fent from all places to yield themselves, without putting him to further pains. Only the City of Phlorus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which it might have done long, if the horrid Rebel had not been too foolifh. Emilius landed a great part of his Army in the Ille of Phorus by night, and belowed them in covert, presenting himself the next morning with twenty Ships before the Town, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his Power iffued out againft the Consul, and was foon intercluded from the Town, by thofe that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths, to a Creek where he had Shipping ready for him, and embarked himself, leaving all his Estate unto them, of whole Liberality he first had it.

This business, though it were foon difpatched, yet prevented it not the Siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal fate down, ere Emilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the Siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the brave Sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their General received a dangerous Wound in the Thigh, that caufed him to lie many days unable to move. Nevertheless he was not unmindful of his Work in the mean while; but gave order to raife certain moveable Towers, that might equal thofe which were built on the Walls of the City, and to prepare to batter the Curtains, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had foon wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of Wall; whereat an hot assault was given: but it was fo well fustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the Breach, and out of some ground within the Town, which upon the first fury they had won, but they were purfued even to their own Trenches and Camp. Nevertheless the Carthaginian Army, wherein were about an hundred and fifty thousand men, did fo weary the Towns-men with continual travail, that at length it got within the Walls; and was only hindered from taking full poffeffion of the City, by some Counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alein a Saguntine, that conveyed himself out of the Town, to treat with Hannibal for fome accord. But the Conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were fo severe, and without all compaffion of Honour, as Alein durst not return to propound them to his Countrymen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had: Gold, Silver, Plate, and other Riches within the City: yea, the City it felf to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising that he would affign fome other place for their Habitation: not allowing them to carry out with them any other thing wherewith to fufftain themselves, than the Cloaths on their backs; or other Arms to defend them, than their Nails and Teeth. Yet might they far better have fubmitted themselves unto this miserable appointment (feeing thereby they might have enjoyed their Lives, and faved the Honour of their Wives and Daughters) than to have refled at the difcretion of the Conqueror, as foon after they did, by whom their Wives and Daughters were deflowered before their faces; and all put to Sword that were above fourteen years of age. For it was a poor comfort which a great number of them took, when not daring to fight, and fell their Blood at the deareft rate, they thut themselves up like moft wretched Creatures, in their own Houfes, and therin burnt themselves with all that they had: fo dying unrevenged. The Treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Army: the Slaves and other Booty, he divided among his Souldiers, relieving fome things of choice, wherewith to prefernt his Friends at Carthage, and to animate them unto the War.

These Tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to be angry at their own flowness, in forbearing to fend help unto the Saguntines, that held out eight months, looking fill for fuccour in-vain. Wherefore they determined to repair their Honour, by taking fharp revenge. To this end they fent Embassadors again to Carthage, demanding only, Whether it were by general confent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made War upon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it feemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto answer was made in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect. That this their fecond Embassage, howsoever qualified with mild words, was indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they only required justice againft Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian Speaker) whether the General of our Army in Spain, in befieging Saguntum, have only followed his own Council; or whether he did it by direction from us, it is not the Question which the Romans ought to ask us. That which is indeed worthy examination or difpute, is, Whether it were lawful, or unlawful, for Hannibal to do as he hath done. For it belongs to us, to call our own Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their Faults and Errors; to you, to challenge us if we have done any thing contrary to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our Negotiation with Lutetius the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the Peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no difpute. As touching the laft Agreement between you and Adrubal, wherein you will say that the Saguntines were comprehended by Name; it is you that have taught us how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treaty between us and Lutetius, to your own difadvantage, you caft it upon your Consuls preffumption; as premiffing those things for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawful for the Romans to difavow the Actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctual and precise Warrant; the fame liberty may we also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour to perform those bargains which Adrubal had made for us, without our commandment and confent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meer Cavil. For Lutetius the Consul, in this Treaty of Peace with the Carthaginians, had exprefly referred the allowance thereof to the People of Rome. It had been therefore much better to have dealt plainly, and to have allegeded, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Ille of Sardinia, and withal, of twelve hundred Talents: which Perjury, the State of Carthage being now grown able, would revenge with open War. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into Confederacy, and forthwith inferted their Names into the Treaty of Peace with Afrubal: that the Treaty with Afrubal, and all other Business between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of Peace, in taking away Sardinia, was no better than Roman Injuries; as implying this Commination, Do whatsoever we require, else will we make War, without regard of our Oath, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of Contention (as Polybius takes) the best of their Plea. Yet since Livy himself doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did enflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of revenge, we may reasonably think, that the mention of this Injury was omitted, not so much upon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up such ancient matter of quarrel, to show that the War, now towards, had long been thought upon, and like to be made with extraordinary force; in another manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Ambassadors, to deliver unto them in plain terms the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering up the skirt of his Gown, as if somewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this short Reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Even which of them you yourself have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and there it among you. Which all the Assembly willingly accepted.

This was plain dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each Part had resolved to make War, it was merely frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of Peace, have ever been maintained by the Party unwilling, or unable to finish the War. The rusty Sword, and the empty Parole, do always plead performance of Covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their own advantage: and commonly (seeing Peace between ambitious Princes, and States, is but a kind of breathing) the best-advised have rather begun with the Sword, than with the Trumpet. So dealt the Agronomi with the French in Naples; Henry the second, of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brissac, to surprize as many Places as he could, ere the War broke out; Don John, with the Netherlands; and Philip the second, of Spain, with the English, when in the great Embargo, he took all our Ships and Goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of Injuries received from these Enemies, had another private and hereditary desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His Father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his Journey into Spain, had solemnly bound him by Oath, to pursue them with immortal hatred; and to work them all possible mischief, as soon as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine years old, when his Father caused him to lay his Hand upon the Altar, and make this Vow: so that it was no marvel, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath Hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine own part, I do not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soon as their Coeffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves Enemies to the People of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spain and Africk. His Journey into Italy.

WAR being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved, not to put up his Sword, which he had drawn against the Saguntines, until he had therewith opened his passage unto the Gates of Rome. So began the second Punic War; second to none, that ever the Senate and People of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintered at Carthage; where he licenced his Spanish Soldiers to visit their Friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the mean while he gave Instructions to his Brother Afrubal, for the government of Spain in his absence. He also took order, to send a great many Troops of Spaniards into Africk, to equal the numbers of Africans formerly drawn thence into Spain; to the end, that for the one Nation might remain as Pledges and Gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk thirteen thousand, eight hundred, and fifty Foot, and twelve hundred Horse; also eight hundred slingers of the Baleares. Besides these, he selected four thousand Foot, all young men, and of quality, out of the best Cities of Spain; which he appointed to be garrison'd in Carthage itself, not so much to regard of their Forces, as that they might serve for Hostages: for among those four thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their several States, had their Sons or Kinsmen. He also left with his Brother, to guard the Coast and Ports, fifty and seven Gallies; whereof thirty seven were presently armed, and appointed for the War. Of Africans, and other Nations strangers, he left with him above twelve thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spain and Africk, he sent Discoverers before him, to view the passages of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Alpes. He also sent Ambassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtain a quiet passage: that he might being his Army entire into Italy, and not be compelled to diminish his Forces, by any War in the way, till he came to encounter the Romans. His Ambassadors, and Discoverers, being returned with good satisfaction, in the beginning of the Spring, he pass'd over the River of Iberus, with an Army consisting of fourscore and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse. All those Parts of Spain, into which he had not entered before, he now subdued: and appointed Hanno, (not that old Enemy of his House, who fare still at Carthage) to govern Spain on the East-side of Iberus; to whom he left an Army of ten thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spain, some of his Spanish Soldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that others might not also do, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to pass, that his Journey seemed the less tedious unto those that accompanied him, as that not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his Army, consisting now but of fifty thousand Foot, and nine thousand Horse, he pass'd the Pyrenes, and entered into Gaul. He found the Gauls that bordered upon Spain, ready in Arms, to forbid his entrance into their Country: but won them, with gentle speech, and rich Presents that he bestowed upon their Leaders, to favour his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to the Bank of Rhodanus, where dwell, on each side of the River, a People called Volcae. These were unacquainted with the cause of his coming; and therefore sought to keep him from passing over the Water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gauls, that inhabited on the West-side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Viverrerz and Limnion. For although many of them had transported themselves and their Goods, into the Countrey of Daulphine, thinking to defend the further Bank against him, yet such as remained, being desirous to free their Countrey of so many ill Guests, were better pleased to have their Countreymen beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their own store of Corn and Cattel wasted, by the long stay of so great an Army, as lay upon them. For which Reason, they helped him to make Boats; informed him of another more easie passage, higher-up the River; and lent him Guides. When the Vessels for Transportation of his Army were in readiness, he sent Hanno, the Son of Bomilcar, up the River, himself in the mean while making countenance to enter the Ford below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Gauls unawares upon their own side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the River in their faces, the further Bank was won, though with some difficulty, and the Enemies dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying over his Elephants, who marvellously feared the Water. He was therefore driven to make Rasses of Trees, and cover them with Earth and Turf; whereof he fastened one to each Bank, that might serve as a Bridge, to and from another of the same sort, but loose, upon which the Beasts were rowed over.

Having pass'd this first brunt, and overcome both the rage of the River, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gauls Cisalpine, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the Passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common Report made them; and from these he received Guides, with many other Encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himself extremely incumbered by the Senones, and lost, both of his Carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainly assailed by them, before he could recover the plain Countreys on the other side. And whereas this Journey over the Mountains cost him fifteen days travel, he was every day, more or less, not only charged by those Mountainers, but wretched, extremely beaten with grievous Weather and Snow: it being in the beginning of Winter, when he began, and overcame this Passage. But the fair and fertile Plains, which were now ready to receive them, with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gauls, who by their proper Forces had so often invaded the Roman Territory, gave them great comfort, and encouragement to go on: having nothing else of difficulty remaining, but that which from the beginning they made account to overcome, by their proper valour and resolution; namely, the Roman Armies, and Resistance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vain solicited the Spaniards and Gauls to take their part. The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gauls against the Romans.

THE Countreys of Spain and Gauls, through which the Carthaginians marched thus far, had been solicited before, by the same Roman Ambassadors, who had denounced the War at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, took Spain in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least, to disswade them from contracting any Friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a People in Spain: from whom, in open Assembly, they received by one that spake for the rest this uncomfortable Answer. With what face (saith he) can ye Romans persuade us to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the Friendship of the Carthaginians, seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise, than so? For they, relying on your faith, and promised assistance, have been utterly rooted out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else have held their assured Friends, and good Neighbours, as we, and other the People of Spain have found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from us, That for our parts (and I think, I may answer for the rest of our Countreymen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindness at our hands, who are resolved, never to make account of their protection, nor amity. From the Volcians, the Ambassadors took their way towards the Gauls, using their best Arguments to persuade them, not to suffer the Carthaginians to pass into Italy, through their Territory: and withal greatly glorifying themselves, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gauls laugh't them to scorn, and had hardly the patience, to hear them speak. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibal's passage into Italy, entertain a War which is not meant to be made against us? Shall we hold the War among our selves, and in our own Territory, by force, which marcheth with a speedy pace from us, towards our ancient Enemies? Have the Romans deserved to well of us, and the Carthaginians to ill, that we should first fire on our own Houses, to save theirs from burning? No, we know it well, that the Romans have already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territory and Inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our Enemies, who have no way as yet offended us, nor we them.

With this unpleasant Answer the Ambassadors returned home, carrying no good News, of Friends likely to help them, but rather some assurance from the People of Massilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gauls were determined to take part with their Enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gauls gave hasty proof. For when the News was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had pass'd Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome, that alone sufficed to stir up the Bois, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These People were lately offended at the Plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, relying thereupon that, which they supposed to be now at hand, they laid aside all regard of those Hostages, which they had given to the Romans, and fell upon the new Colonies. The Towns it seems that they could not win; for Hannibal forthwith failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Country) to fly to Modena, where they besieged them. The Siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gauls, having little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed weary, and seemed desirous to have peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some Meeting; that they might therein lay hand upon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeem their Hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Ambassadors to treat with them, and to conclude a Peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prætor, who lay in these Quarters with an Army, hearing this outrage, marched in all haste to the relief of the Besieged. But the Gauls, having laid a strong Ambush in a Wood adjoining to the way, fell upon the Prætor so opportunely, as he was utterly overthrown, and all his followers left dead in the Place; a few excepted, that recovered, by fast running, a little Village, but defensible, upon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Attilius, another of the Prætors, was hastily sent, to relieve the Besieged, with one Legion, and five thousand of the Roman Associates: which Forces were taken out of the Consul's Army, and supplied by a new Levy.

As the Gauls were too rash and hasty, so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-advised, in the beginning of this War. They were never perfwaded, that Carthage, which had almost fervently endured so many Injunctures, in time of the late Peace, would be so brave and courageous on the sudden, as to attempt the Conquest of Italy itself. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make War in Spain, the other in Africa: resting secure of all danger at home. Timæ Sempronius took his way toward Africa, with an hundred and three score Quinquagèmes, or Gallies, of five to an Oar; which preparation may seem to threaten even the City of Carthage, to which it shall not come near. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Provence; and used such diligence, having the Wind all favourable, as in five days he recovered Messina. There he was advertised, of Hannibal's having passed the River of Rhodanus; whom he thought to have found butte yet a while in Spain. Hannibal had also news of the Consul's arrival: whereof he was neither glad, nor sorry; as not meaning to have to do with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts, to discover the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman Horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly brag, having slain only two hundred, and lost of their own, one hundred and forty. But when Scipio drew near, to have met with the Carthaginians, he found, that they were gone three days before; and that (as he then found assuredly true) with an intent to look upon the Walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended Voyage into Spain. Nevertheless he sent away thither his Brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Army, to try what might be done against Adrubal, and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Country. He himself, taking with him a few choice Bands, returned by Sea to Pisa; and so passing through Tuscany into Lombardy, drew together the broken Troops of Manlius and Attilius, that lately had been beaten by the Gauls: with which Forces he made Head against the Enemy, thinking to find him over-laboured, with travel of his painful Journey.

§. IV.

Scipio the Roman Consul overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Battle of the Roman Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great Battle at Trebia.

FIVE months Hannibal had spent in his tedious Journey from Carthage; with great Murther he could make, when he had passed the Alps, it is not easily found. Some reckon his Foot at an hundred thousand, and his Horse at twenty thousand; others report them to have been only two-and-ten thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse. Hannibal himself, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter Sum. Yet the Gauls, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have mightily increased his Army, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the Banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand Foot, and eight thousand Horse; of which, all save those remembered by himself in the Inscription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have perished, by Dileas, Enemies, Rivers, and Mountains; which mischiefs had devoured, each, their several shares.

Having newly passed the Alps, and scarce refreshed his wearied Army in the Country of Piemont, he sought to win the Friendship of the Taurini, who lay next to his way. But the Taurini desired to hold War at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good Friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his Amity. Wherefore he assaulted their Town, and won it by force in three days. Their Spoil served well to hearten his Army; and their Calamity, to terrify the Neighbouring places. So the Gauls, without more ado, fell unit to his side: many for fear, many for goodwill, according to their former inclination. This disposition ran through the whole Country: which joyned, or was all in a readiness to joyn, with the Carthaginians; when the news of Scipio's Consul, at his arrival, made some to be more advised, than the rest. The Name of the Romans was terrible in those Quarters; what was in the Carthaginians experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten through the most defensible Passages, many a speech had been heard of his approach, many a fate still, for very fear, who else would have concluded a League with these new-come Friends; and some, for greater fear, offered their service against the Carthaginians, whom nevertheless they wished well to speed.

This wavering Affection of the Province, whereinto they were entered, made the two Generals hasten to the trial of a Battle. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondered at the others great expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange, that the Consul, whom he had left behind him on the other side of the Alps, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himself in the Plains; Scipio admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountains, and the great spirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed, at Hannibal's success, and sudden arrival. Wherefore fore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste unto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicily; giving him to understand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas he had been directed to make the War in Africa, it was now their pleasure that he should forbear to prosecute any such Attempt, but that he should return the Army under his charge, with all possible speed, to save Italy itself. According to this Order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Lilibeum; with direction to land the Army at Ariminum, a Port Town not far from Ravenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haste. In the mean while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so near, that fight they must, ere they could part asunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Soldiers, by the best Arguments they had: unto which Hannibal added the Rhetoric of a present example, that he shewed upon certain Prisoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, having been no less miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withal so often scourged on their naked Bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to be delivered from their miseries by any kind of present death; were brought into the middle of the Army: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slain; with condition, being the Victor, to receive his liberty, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause Lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chiefs of the Gauls were wont to use in single Combats. Every one of these unhappy men wished, that his own Lot might speed; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victory. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and having none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poor creatures were willing, upon whatsoever uneven terms, to rid themselves out of slavery. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them, wrought also upon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the Victory had gotten his liberty, together with an Horse and Armour: but even him also, who being slain in Fight, had escaped that miserable condition, unto which his Companions were returned. Their General perceiving what impression this dumb show had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their own condition, speaking to this effect. That he had laid before them an example of their own efforts: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to run the same fortune, that these slaves had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die or (which these Prisoners esteemed far more grievous) to live in a perpetual slavery: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himself any hope of life by flight; since the Mountains, the Rivers, the great distance from their own Countries, and the pursuit of merciless Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore prayed them to remember, that they, who had even now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their own case; seeing there was never any in the World, appointed with such a resolution, that had ever been broken, or beaten by their Enemies. On the contrary, he told them, that the Romans, who were to fight upon their own Soil, and in view of their own Towns; who knew as many ways to save themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withal, could no way entertain such a resolution as theirs: seeing the fate necessary, (to which nothing seems impossible) did no way press them, or constrain them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantial Argument, that there was no mean, between Victory and Death, encourage his Companions. For (saith a great Captain of France) La commodité de la retraite avance la fuite; The commodity of a retreat, doth greatly advance a flat running away.

Scipio, on the other side, after that he had given order for the laying of a Bridge over the River of Ticinum, did not neglect to use the best Arguments and Reasons he could, to encourage the Army he led: putting them in mind of the great Conquests and Victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and over how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Army commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than that of Carthaginians, whom in their late War they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withal to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a Troop of Brigands and Thieves, than an Army like to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and starved, as neither the Men, nor Horses, had strength or courage to sustain the first charge that should be given upon them. Nay (saith he) ye your selves may make judgement what daring they have now remaining, after so many Travels and Miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had passed the Rhone, their Horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himself, fearing our approach, ran head-long towards the Alps: thinking it a less dishonour, to die there by Frost, Famine, and Precipitation, than by the sharp Swords of the Romans, which had so often cut down his People, both in Africa, and in Sicily.

It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being far advanced before the groves of his Army, with his Horse; and the Roman having also with him some light-armed Foot, to view the Ground, and the Enemies Countenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other, Scipio lent before him his Horse-men of the Gauls, to begin the Fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground between their Troops, to assist them: himself with his Roman men at Arms, following softly in good order. The Gauls (who were desirous to try the mettle of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their Foot that should have aided them, shrank at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for fear of being trodden down by the Enemies Horse. This notwithstanding, the Gauls maintained the Fight, and did more hurt than they received: as presuming that they were well backed. Neither was the Consul unmindful to relieve them: their hardihood deserving his aid; and the hasty flight of those that should have stood by them, admonishing him that it was needful. Wherefore he adventured himself so far, that he received a dangerous Wound, and had been left in the place, if his Son (afterward furnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the Honour of this Rescue to a Ligurian Slave. Whilst the Romans were buſied in helping their Conſul; an unexpected Storm came driving at their backs, and made them look about how to help themſelves. Hannibal had appointed his Nu-midian Light Horſe, to give upon the Romans in Flank, and to compaſs them about, whilst he with his men at Arms ſuſtained their Charge, and met them in the Face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the ſcattered Foot, that ran away at the firſt encounter; and then falling on the backs of thoſe whole-looks were fallen upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impreſſion the Romans were ſhuffled together, and routed, ſo that they all betook them to their ſpeed, and let unto their Enemies the Honour of the day.

When Scipio ſaw his Horſe thus beaten, and the reſt of his Army thereby greatly diſcouraged; he thought it a point of wiſdom, having loſt to many of his Fleet upon the firſt puff of wind, to take Port with the reſt, before the extremity of the Tempeſt over-took him. For he ſaw by the lowing morning, what manner of day it was like to prove. Therefore his Barrail of Foot being yet unbroken, he in a manner ſole the retreat, and recovered the Bridge over Ticinus, which he had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haſte that he made, he left fix hundred of his Rear behind him, who were the laſt that ſhould have paſſed, and ſtaid to break the Bridge. Herein he followed this Rule of a good Man of War, Si certamen quandoque dubium videatur, tacitam miles arripuit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which muſt be underſtood in this ſort: If a General of an Army, by ſome unſperous beginning, doubt the ſucceſs, or find his Army fearful or wavering, it is more profitable to ſeal a ſafe Retreat, than to abide the uncertain event of Battle.

It was two days after, ere Hannibal could paſs the River; Scipio the whilst reſreſhing his men, and eaſing himſelf of his Wound in Placentia. But as ſoon as Hannibal preſented his Army before the Town, offering Battle to the Romans, who daſt not accept it, nor iſſue forth of their Camp; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for fear, gathered out of his fear courage to forſake him. They thought that now the long-deſired time was come, in which better Chieftains and Souldiers than Aneroſtus, Britomarus, and the Gellates, were come to help them: if they had the hearts to help themſelves. Wherefore the ſame night they fell upon the Roman Camp; wounded and ſlew many; eſpecially of thoſe Guards that kept Watch at the Gate; with whole Heads in their Hands, they fled over to the Carthaginians, and preſented their Service. Hannibal received them exceeding courteouſly, and diſmiſſed them to their own places, as men likely to be of more uſe to him, in perſwading the reſt of their Nation to be come his Confederates, than in any other ſervice at the preſent.

About the fourth Watch of the Night following, the Conſul ſole a Retreat, as he had done before, but not with the like eaſe and ſecurity. Hannibal had a good eye upon him, and ere he could get far, ſent the Numidians after him: following himſelf with all his Army. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of Spoil, had not ſtaid to ranſack their Camp, and thereby given time to all, ſave ſome few in Rear, that were ſlain or taken, to paſs the River of Trebia, and ſave themſelves. Scipio, being both unable to travel by reaſon of his Wound, and withal finding it expedient to attend the coming of his Fellow-Conſul, incampt himſelf ſtrongly upon the Banks of Trebia. Neceſſity required that he ſhould ſo do; yet this diſmiſſed his Reputation. For every day more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian ſide; among whom came in the Boj, that brought with them the Roman Commiſſioners, which they had taken in the late Inſurrection. They had hitherto kept them as Pledges, to redeem their own Hoſtages: but now they deliver them up to Hannibal, as Tokens and Pledges of their Affections towards him; by whole help they conceived better hope of recovering their own Men and Lands. In the mean while, Hannibal, being in great ſcarcity of Victuals, attempted the taking of Clafidium, a Town wherein the Romans had laid up all their Store and Munition. But there need no Force; a Brandiſten, whom the Romans had truſted with keeping it, fold it for a little Money.

The news of theſe diſaſters brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a deſire of haſty revenge, than any great sorrow for the loſs received; ſeeing that in a manner, all their Foot, wherein their Strength and Hope conſiſted, were as yet entire. They therefore haſted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived towards Ariminum, where the Army, by him ſent out of Scil, awaited his coming. He therefore haſted thither, and from thence he marched ſpeedily towards his Colleague, who attended him upon the Banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyed in one, the Conſuls deviled about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiving from Scipio the relation of what had paſſed ſince Hannibal's arrival; the fortune of the late Fight, and what error or miſadventure the Romans were therein ſoiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the Revolt and Treafon of the Gauls.

Sempronius having received from Scipio the ſtate of the Affairs in thoſe parts; fought by all means to try his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his Wounds, that thereby he might purchaſe to himſelf the ſole Glory of the Victory, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. He alſo feared the Election of the new Conſuls, his own time being well near expired. But Scipio perſwaded the contrary, objecting the unſkillfulneſs of the new-come Souldiers, and withal, gave him good reaſon to aſſure him, that the Gauls, naturally unconſtant, were upon terms of abandoning the Party of the Carthaginians; thoſe of them inhabiting between the Rivers of Trebia and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haſte to find out the Diſhonour, which he might otherwiſe eaſily have avoided. This reſolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleaſing to Hannibal, who feared nothing ſo much as delay and loſs of time. For the ſtrength of his Army, conſiſting in Strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; he no leſs feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being far from their own Home, had many paſſions moving them to turn their faces towards it. To further the deſire of Sempronius, it fell out ſo, that about the ſame time, the Gauls inhabiting near unto Trebia, complained of Injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not ſupply Hannibal with Neceſſaries, as he ſuppoſed that they might have done, although he daily reprehended their negli-negligence, telling them, that for their ſakes, and to let them at liberty, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his own Carver, and took from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they fly to the Romans for help: and to make their Tale the better, ſay that this wrong is done them, becauſe they reſuſed to joyn with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he ſuſpected their Falſhood, and was aſſured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it ſtood with the Honour of Rome to preſerve the Confederates from ſuffering injury: and that hereby might be won the Friendſhip of all the Gauls. Therefore he ſent out a thouſand Horſe, which coming unlooked for upon Hannibal's Foragers, and finding them in heavy loaden, cut many of them in pieces, and chaſed the reſt even unto their own Camp. This indignity made the Carthaginians fall out againſt them: who caused them to retire faſter than they came. Sempronius was ready to back his own men; and repelled the Enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Army was drawn forth, and a Battle ready to be fought, if the Carthaginians had not reſuſed it.

This Victory (for ſo the Conſul would have it called) made the Romans in general deſirous to try the main chance in open Field: all the perſwaſions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this diſpoſition Hannibal was advertiſed by the Gauls, his Spies, that were in the Roman Camp. Therefore he bethought himſelf how to help forward the Victory, by adding ſome ſtratagem to his Forces. He found in the hollow of a Water-courſe, over-grown with high Reed, a fit Trench to cover an Ambuſh. Thenceinto he caſts his Brother Mago, with a thouſand choice Horſe, and as many Foot. The reſt of his Army, after they had well warmed, and well fed themſelves in their Camp, he led into the Field, and marched towards the Conſul. Early in the morning, he had ſent over Trebia ſome Companies of Numidian light Horſe, to brave the Enemy, and draw him forth to a bad Dinner, ere he had broke his Faſt. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunity to fight, and therefore not only ſuſtained out of his Camp, but forded the River of Trebia, in a moſt cold and miſerable day; his Foot being wet almoſt to the Arm-holes, which, together with the want of Food, did ſo enfeeble and cool their Courages, as they wanted force to handle the Arms they bare. Strong they were in Foot, as well of their own Nation, as of the Latins, having of the one, fifteen, of the other, twenty thouſand. The maſs of theſe they ranged in a groſs Battailon, guarded on the Flanks with three thouſand Horſe: thruſting their Light-armed and Darters in looſe Troops in the head of the reſt, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of Foot, were in a manner equal to their Enemies; in Horſe, they had by far the better, both in number and goodneſs. When therefore the Roman Horſe, ranged on the Flanks of their Foot, were broken by the Numidians, when their Foot were charged both in Front and Flank, by the Spaniards, Gauls, and Elephants; when finally the whole Army was unawares preſt in the Rear, by Mago and his two thouſand, that roſe out of their place of ambuſh, then fell the Romans by heaps under the Enemies Swords, and being beaten down, as well fighting in diſorder, as flying towards the River, by the Horſe-men that purſued them, there eſcaped no more of fix and thirty thouſand, than ten thouſand of all ſorts, Horſe and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which every one deſerved to be recompenced with the loſs that followed. The firſt was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champaign, being by far inferior in Horſe, and withal thereby ſubject to the African Elephants, which in incloſed or uneven Grounds, and Wood-lands, would have been of no uſe. His ſecond error was, that he made no diſcovery of the place upon which he fought, whereby he was groſſy over-reach and injured, by the ambuſh which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his Foot-men with empty Stomachs, in the River of Trebia, even in a moſt cold and froſty day, whereby in effect they loſt the uſe of their Limbs. For as one ſaith well: There is nothing more inconvenient and perilous, than to preſent an Army tired with travel, to an Enemy fresh and fed; ſince where the ſtrength of body fails, the generoſity of mind is but as an unprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Army, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; ſtealing away the ſame night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians; who either perceived him not, becauſe of the Showers, or would not perceive him, becauſe they were over-wearied. Sempronius eſcaped with extreame danger, flying through the Country that was overrun by the Enemies Horſe. He was attended by more than were requiſite in a ſecret Flight; yet by fewer than could have made reſiſtance, if the Enemy had met with him. Nevertheless he got away, and came to Rome, where he did his Office in chooſing new Conſuls for the year following: and then returned into his Province, with a freſh ſupply againſt Hannibal.

§. V.

The Departure of Hannibal from the Ciſalpine Gauls into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Conſul ſlain; and his Army deſtroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thraſymen.

The Winter growing on apace, was very ſharp, and unfit for ſervice, to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keep the Field, lay warm in Placentia and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not ſuffer them to reſt very quiet, but vexed them with continual alarms; ſending divers places, taking ſome, beating the Gauls their adherents, and winning the Ligurians to his Party, who preſented him, in token of their faithful Love, with two Roman Queſtors or Treaſurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen, the Sons of Senators, which they had intercepted. Theſe, and in general all ſuch Priſoners as he had of the Romans, he held in ſtreight places, loaden with Irons, and miſerably fed: thoſe of their Followers, he not only well entertained, but ſent them to their Countries without Ranſome; with this Proſpectation, That he therefore undertook the War in Italy, to free them from the Oppreſſion of the Romans. By theſe means he hoped, and not in vain, to draw many of them to his Party and aſſiſtance. But the Gauls were not capable of ſuch perſwaſions. They ſtood in fear, left he ſhould make their Country the Seat of the War, and perhaps take it from them. They were alſo more grieved than reaſon willed them, at his feeding upon them, and waſting their Territory. Where ſome of them conſpired againſt his Life: others admoniſhed him of the danger: and theſe that gave him the advice, were ready ſoon after to praſtiſe againſt him;

him; but were in like sort deterred. He was therefore glad to see Perennes of Hair, and false Beards of divers colours, to the end that he might not be described, nor known to those that should undertake to make him away. Fain he would have passed the Apennine, upon the first appearance of Spring, but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had seen more Swallows than one. At length, when the year was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leave of these giddy Companions, and bring the War nearer to the Gates of Rome. So away he went, having his Army greatly increased with Ligurians and Gauls, more servicable Friends abroad, than in their own Country. That the passage of the Apennine Mountains was troublesome, I hold it needless to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell upon Hannibal, when he was travelling through and over them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all ways foul, than to any intolerable difficulty in that Journey. Nevertheless, to avoid the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to have been erected upon the ordinary passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to travel through the Fens and rotten grounds of Tuscany. In those Marshes and Bogs, he lost all his Elephants, save one, together with the use of one of his Eyes, by the moistness of the Air, and by lodging on the cold Ground, and wading through deep Mire and Water. In brief, after he had with much ado recovered the firm and fertile Plains, he lodged about Arretium, where he somewhat refreshed his wearied Followers, and heard news of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Servilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this year: Servilius, a tractable man, and wholly governed by advice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed Popular Orator, who having once been robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a device of the Senators, was afraid to be served to again, unless he quickly finished the War. This jealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entered into his Office, left his Adversaries, by faining some religious impediments, should detain him within the City, or find other business for him at home, to disappoint him of the Honour that he hoped to get in the War. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Town, and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Arretium. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, revoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their injunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fiery disposition of this Consul, promised unto Hannibal great assurance of Victory. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him unto fight, ere Servilius came with the rest of the Army. All the Country between Fesula and Arretium, he put to Fire and Sword, even under the Consuls Nose, which was enough to make him stir, that would not have been still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true, that a great Captain of France hath said: Pays gaste n'est pas perdu: A wasted Country is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Country, Flaminius thought his own Honour to be much impaired, and therefore advanced towards the Enemy. Many advised him (which had indeed been best) to have patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to hear: saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians went burning down all Italy before them, to the Gates of Rome. Therefore he took Horle, and commanded the Army to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensigns stuck so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Ensign-bearer. Of this Tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a jest: saying, that the cowardly Knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the Earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto. For he commanded that it should be dugged up, if fear had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking withal, whether Letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this Jealousie, both he, and the Senate that gave him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territory of Corina, as far as to the Lake of Thralymene, was on a light Fire, which whilst the Consul thought to quench with his Enemies Blood, he pursued Hannibal so unadvisedly, that he fell, with his whole Army, into an ambush cunningly laid for him, between the Mountains of Corina, and the Lake. There was he charged unawares, on all sides (save only where that great Lake of Persia permitted neither his Enemies to come at him, nor him to fly from them) knowing not which way to turn, or make resistance. So was he slain in the place, accompanied with fifteen thousand dead Carcasses of his Countrymen. About six thousand of his men, that had the Vant-guard, took courage, as for the most part happens, out of desperation, and breaking through the Enemies that stood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountains. If they had returned, and given charge upon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered the fortune of the day. But that violence of their fear, which kindled by necessity, had wrought the effects of hardiness: was well allwaged, when they ceased to despair of saving their Lives by flight. They stood still in a cold Sweat upon the Hill-top, hearing under them a terrible noise, but not discovering how things went, because of the great Fog that held all the Morning. When it grew toward Noon, the Air was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable Slaughter of their Fellows. But they staid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were despoiled, and attached by the Enemies Horse. This they should have thought upon sooner, since they had no mind to return unto the Fight. For despoiled they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who overtook them by night in a Village, which he surrounded with his Horse: and so they yielded the next day, rendering their Arms upon his promise of their Lives and Liberties. This accord Hannibal refused to confirm; saying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authority to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his own Honour) what it was to keep no Faith: and fired them with a trick of their own. For if it were lawful unto the Romans, to alter Covenants, or add unto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be fairs to pay certain hundreds, and yet more hundreds of Talents, besides their first Bargain; as also to renounce their Interest in Sardinia, and be limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the Conditions of the late concluded Peace: then can Hannibal be as Roman as themselves; and make them know, that perdition itself gaineth no more in propriety, than it loseth in the change of Fortune. Fifteen thousand Italian Prisoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which, all that were not Romans, he set free without Ransom, professing, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman Tyranny, that he had undertaken this War. But the Romans he kept in freight Prison, and in Fetters, making them learn to eat hard Meat. This was a good way to breed in the People of Italy, if not a Love of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this War had not concerned the general Safety, but only the preserving of her own Neck from the Yoke of Slavery, which her over-strong Enemies would thrust upon her, in revenge of her Oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by success of many Ages, is not lost in one or two Barrels. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginian can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the Battle of Thralymene, C. Cervinius, with four thousand Roman Horse, drew near unto the Camp of Hannibal. He was sent from Arretium, by Servilius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius; but coming too late, he increased only the Misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this Company, who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great Overthrow, charged them, and brake them, and killing almost half of them, drove the rest unto an high piece of Ground, whence they came down, and simply yielded to Mercy the next day. Servilius himself was in the mean while skirmishing with the Gauls; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the News were brought him of his Colleagues Overthrow and Death in Hetruria, that made him hasten back to the defence of Rome.

In these Passages it is easy to discern the fruits of popular jealousy, which perwaded the Romans to the yearly change of their Commanders in the Wars, which greatly endangered and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certain it is, that all men are far better taught by their own Errors, than by the examples of their Fore-goes. Flaminius had heard in what a Trap Sempronius had been taken but the year before, by this subtil Carthaginian, yet suffered he himself to be caught soon after in the same manner. He had also be like forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be prevented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole Honour of bearing Hannibal in Battle, without help of his Companion Scipio, had been rewarded with shame and loss, else would he not, contrary to all good advice, have been so hasty to fight, before the arrival of Servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his Charge, it is probable that he would have taken his Companion with him the second time, and have searched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: both which, this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Government of France ten years, Cæsar brought that mighty Nation together with the Helvetians and many of the German, under the Roman Yoke; into which parts had been there very year a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if ever, have been subdued. For it is more than the best Wit in the World can do, to inform it self, within one years compass, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helps, whereby to prosecute a War to the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three years; whence, by reason of the shortness of that their time, many of them have returned as wild as they went out; others have profited more, and yet when they began but to know the first rudiments of War, and Government, fitting the Country, they have been called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath ever been the course of the World, rather to follow old errors, than to examine them, and of Princes and Governments to uphold their foolish ignorance, by the old examples and policy of other Ages and People, though neither likeness of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, have perwaded the imitation.

S. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to contain the Force of Hannibal, by lingering War. Minutius, the Master of the Horse, encouraged and advanced by the People, for bold and successful attempting, adventures rashly upon Hannibal; and is like to perish with his Army, but rescued by Fabius.

Greatly were the Romans amazed at this their ill success, and at the danger apparent; which threatened them in more terrible manner, than ever did War, since Rome it self was taken. They were good Soldiers, and so little accustomed to receive an Overthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and again, in open Field, all Italy was strangely affected with his success, and held him in admiration, as one that could work Wonders. But Pyrrhus his Quarrel was not grounded upon hate: he only fought Honour, and fought (as it were) upon a bravery: demeaning himself like a courteous Enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman Name; against which he burned with desire of revenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thralymene witnessed his purpose, and his ability. Which to withstand, they fled unto a remedy that had long been out of use, and created a Dictator. The Dictators Power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject unto comprole of the whole City. Wherefore this Officer was seldom chosen, but upon some extremity, and for no longer time than six months. He was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood upon his Prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consul being dead, and the other too far off, the People took upon them, as having supreme Authority, to give the Dignity by their Election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of War in the City. Novum factum, novum consilium expects Contrary Winds, contrary Courses. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the Horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more upon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amiss in matter of Religion: a good beginning, and commendable, had the Religion been also good. But if it were true (as Sylvi reports it) that the Books of Sybil were consulted, and gave direction in this business of Devotion; then then must we believe, that those books of Sybil, preferred in Rome, were dictated by an evil spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this War to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified; as having not been rightly made before: also that great Plays should be vowed unto Jupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with other such trumpery. This vehemency of superstition, proceeds always from vehemency of fear. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly diffempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two Women that suddenly died, when they saw their Sons return alive from Thraçynene, may serve to bear witness; though it be more properly an example of motherly love. The Walls and Towers of the City, were now repaired and fortified; the Bridges upon Rivers were broken down; and all care taken for defence of Rome it self. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal: word was brought, that the Carthaginian Fleet had intercepted all the supply that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking up all the Ships about Rome and Ofis, to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Four Legions he had levied in haste: and from Arminum he received the Army, which Servilius the Consul had conducted thither.

G g g g then

With these forthwith he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Namidian Horse had over the Romans, he always lodged himself on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the mean while, pursuing his Victory, had ranged over all the Country; and used all manner of cruelty towards the Inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the Sword all that were able to bear Arms. Passing by Spoleum and Ancona, he incamped upon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased and over-travelled Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the Spoils he had gotten. Having refreshed his Army, fed his Horses, cured his wounded Souldiers, and (as Polybius hath it) healed his Horse Heels of the scratches, by washing their patterns in old Wine: he followed the Coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northern Province of the Kingdom of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ran, he had not taken any one City; only he had assailed Spoleum, a Colony of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gave it over.

The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great Siege. This the Protestant Army found true at Poitiers, a little before the Battle of Marston; and their victorious Enemies, anon after, at St. Jean & Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himself in any such Enterprize, as should endanger him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in Force and Reputation; knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the Field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their Gates, without expecting any Engine of Battery. To this end he presented Fabius with Battle, as soon as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of Bravado's. But Fabius would not bite. He well knew the differences between Souldiers bred up, ever since they were Boys, in War and in Blood, trained and hardened in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many Victories there; and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such as had no other seen the Enemy, than been vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian to near, as he kept him from fraging too far; and preserved the Country from utter spoil. He injured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and he brought them first to look on the Lion a far off, that in the end they might fit on his tail.

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Hannibal; taxing Fabius with cowardice and fear. But all fired not this well-advised Commander. For wise men are no more moved with such Noise, than with Wind bruffed out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indirection and danger, than to pursue misfortune: it wasteth it self sooner by succurance, than by opposition. It is the invading Army that desires battle; and this of Hannibal, was both the invading, and the victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to cross the Apennines, and to fall upon the most rich and pleasant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any Arguments be persuaded, to adventure the Roman Army in battle; but being far too weak in Horse, he always kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this wary Dictator to fight; that the Winter came on; and that the Towns stood firm for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though a far off; he resolved to rest his Army, that was laden with Spoil, in some plentiful and assured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must pass along by the Dictators Camp, that hung over his Head upon the Hills of Callicula and Cassinum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly Garden-Country, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of provision for his wintering. It was by meer Error of his Guide, that he first entered within these freights. For he would have been directed unto Cassinum, whence he might both assay the fair City of Capua, which had made him friendly promises under Hand, and hinder the Romans from coming near to prevent him. But his guide misunderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him a wry other way, from Cassinum to Callicula, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the Widow of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginian in a Trap, and won the Victory without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himself by a slight invention, yet serving the turn as well as a better. In driving the Country, he had gotten about two thousand Kine; whose Horns he dressed with dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the dark Night, caused them to be driven up the Hills. The Spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible: especially to those that knew it to be the work of a terrible Enemy. What it should mean, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a device to circumvent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the Hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the Enemies were behind their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no less afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Army, recovered fire ground, without molestation: where he stayed till the next morning; and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in Skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his journey towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the worst manner, keeping still on high grounds, between him and the City, whilst the Carthaginian waited all the Plains. The Carthaginian took Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barns and Store-Houses for Winter, and incamped under the broken Walls. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some business of Religion, and left the Army in charge with Minutius, the Master of the Horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his own sufficiency. He was fully persuaded, that his Romans, in plain Field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtilty and ambush, which he thought himself wise enough to prevent. All the Army was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred by judgment of the Souldiers, in Worthiness to command, before the cold and wary Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden so to do, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme peril of death. But the Honour of the Victory, which he held undoubtedly his own; the love of the Army, and the friends that he had at Home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to fave him from the Dictators Rods and Axes, took he the matter never so heartily. Hannibal on the other side was no less glad, that he should play with a more adventurous gamester. Therefore he drew near: and to provoke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Army to waste the Country. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seems, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a piece of high ground between the two Camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupy it, the Carthaginians seized upon by Night, with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plain force, wan it from them the next day; and entrencing himself thereupon, became their nearer Neighbour.

The main business of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his Men, but for his Horses, which he knew to be the chief of his strength; that he might keep them in good Heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could give the Romans another blow, it would increase his Reputation, encourage his own men, terrifie his Enemies, and give him leave to forrage the Country at Will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many days issue forth of his Camp, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in Harvest. This advantage Minutius wisely espied, and took. For he led forth his Army, and setting it in order, presented battle to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, even at his own Trenches. His Horse, and all his light Armour, divided into many companies, he sent abroad against the foragers; who being dispersed over all the Fields, and laden with booty, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to help them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans took heart to assail his Trenches. They perceived that it was meer Weakness which held him within his Camp; and therefore were bold to despise his great Name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the business, Asdrubal came from Geryon with four thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman Horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom nevertheless he did not rush hurt, as he had received.

For this piece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Army, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he sent the News, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Army had recovered spirit, so far forth that it dared to set upon Hannibal in his own Camp; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the Horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely in all his Dictatorship; whereas indeed he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyful of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of Discipline, and fearful of greater danger, thence likely to ensue. He said that he knew his own place, and what was to be done; that he would reach the Master of the Horse to do so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good success, issuing from bad counsel, was more to be feared than calamity; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be wary. Against these Sermons every one cried out; especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speak, and do what he list, without fear of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be General, and Lord of the Town, in our greatest necessity, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italy to be wasted before his Eyes, to the utter shame of our State; unless he also hinder others from doing better than himself can; or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consul all this while; Servilius is sent away to Sea. I know not why; Hannibal and He, have, as it were, taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forborn to spoil some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into envy and suspicion) and the Dictator giving him leave to spoil all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is even this: He would have the War to last long, that he himself might be long in Office, and have the sole Government both of our City and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonalty of Rome, which gave him this Authority, should again take it from him, and confer it upon one more worthy. But left, in moving the people hereto, I will seem to do him injury; thus far forth I will resem to do him injury; thus far forth I will regard his Honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joined in equal Authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor less necessary, than was the electing of this Dictator by the People.

Though all men, even the Senators, were ill persuaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficial at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to think that his general intent, and care of the Weal publick, was less than very honourable. Wherefore therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of Credit and Authority, besides the Propounder, should should stand up, and formally deliver his approbation; not one of the principal Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both unto a worthy Personage, and (therewithal) unto that Dignity, whose great power had freed the State at several times, from the greatest dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Pretor, was glad of such an opportunity, to win the favour of the Multitude. This fellow was the son of a Butcher; afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbings, to take upon him as a Pleader, dealing in poor mens Causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being advanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobility favoured his very baseness. And now he thought the time was come, for him to give an hard push at the Consulship; by doing that which none of the great men, fearing or favouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hor invecitive, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobility; saying, that it grieved them to see the people do well, and take upon them what belonged unto them, in matter of Government; that they fought to humble the Commons by Poverty, and to impoverish them by War; especially by War at their own doors, which would soon consume every poor mans living, and find him other work to think upon, than matter of State. Therefore he bad them to be wile; and since they had found one (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected unto them and his Country, to reward him according to his good deserts; and give him Authority, as if he might be encouraged and enabled to proceed as he had begun. So the Act passed.

Before this buſie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the Election of a new Consul, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the room of C. Flaminius; and having finished all requisite business, went out of Town, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The News of Minutius his advancement, was at the Camp as soon as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to divide their Authority: whether that one, one day; and the other the next; or each of them, successively, for some longer time, should command in chief. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the Horse equal to the Dictator; but that he should never be his Superior: He would therefore divide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custom. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with half of the Army he could not work such Wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Nevertheless he meant to do his best; and so taking his part of the Army, incamped about a mile and an half from the Dictator. Needful it was (though Lucy seem to tax him for it) that he should do so. For where two several Commanders are not subordinate one unto the other, nor joyined in Commission, but have each entire and absolute charge of his own followers, there are the forces (though belonging unto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one Camp shall not hold them both, without great inconvenience. Polypius neither finds fault with this disposition, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chief successively (as the two Consuls used) with Minutius, by turns. He saith, that Minutius was very refractory; and so proud of his advancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to divide the Forces between them, as is said before, or else to have command over all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subjection, when once they have broken loose from the rigor of Authority, love nothing more than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the proof and assurance of their liberty.

It behoved the Master of the Horse, to make good the Opinion which had thus advanced him. Therefore he was no less careful, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Country lying between them was open and bare, yet as fit for Ambush as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked Valley adjoining, had many, and spacious Caves; able, some one of them to hide Two or Three Hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed Five Hundred Horse, and Five Thousand Foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discovered. But left by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their Holes, he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize upon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and thoughts of the Romans, from their more needful care, to business little concerning them. Like unto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had provoked Minutius to adventure upon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his Honour, in like sort as he got it; he sent first his light Armour, then his Horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his own Troops with fresh Companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soon caught; and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe Retreat. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves, losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew near, in very good order, to relieve them. For this old Captain, perceiving a fair off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly thrown himself, and his followers, did the Office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approve himself, by halting to do good, than by suffering his Enemy to feel the reward of doing ill. Upon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retired; fearing to be well wetted with a shower, from the Cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himself to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to have been saved. So from this time forwards, the War proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would have it; both whilst his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he delivered up his charge unto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Consul had pursued in vain a Carthaginian Fleet, to which he came never within kenning. He ran along all the Coast of Italy; took Hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed over into Africa; and there negligently falling to spoil the Country, was shamefully beaten aboard his Ships, with the loss of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicily; and (being so required by the Dictator's Letters) repaired to the Camp, with his fellow-Consul, where they took charge of the Army.

§. VII.

The Roman People, desirous to finish the War quickly, choose a rough and unworthy Consul. Great Forces levied against Hannibal. Hannibal takes the Romans Prisoners in the Cattle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

WITH little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, hear the great commendations, that were given to Fabius by the principal Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great Overthrow: but he had neither finished the War, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might seem, that the Reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole Winter, contrary to all former custom; since it was never heard before, that any Roman General had willingly suffered the time of his Command to run away without any performance; as if it were honourable to do just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready every man, to discharge the grief and anger of his own private loss, upon the ill administration of the publick.

This Affection of the People, was very helpful to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoved him to strike whilst the Iron was hot; his own Worth being little or none, and his Credit over-weak, to make way into that high Prestige. But the Commonality were then in such a mood, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Whereto then he, had a Knave, Publius Herminius, then Tribune of the People; who flared not to lose the liberty of his place, in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth or modesty. This bold Orator stuck not to affirm, That Hannibal was drawn into Italy, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been overthrown, and was refused by Fabius, with the other two; but had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the Victory of Minutius, when he commanded over all, as Master of the Horse; That without a Plebeian Consul, the War would never be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians as had long since been advanced to Honour by the People, were grown as proud as the old Nobility, and condemned the meaner sort, ever since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needful to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meek new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples love, nor could with more, than to keep it, by well deserving of them. By such persuasions the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure to see a man raised for none other Virtue, than his detracting from their Honour; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alledged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending upon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he again deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to prevail in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum took Name and Being in Rome, at the Death of Romulus; and was in use at the Death of other Kings. The order of it was this: All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an Hundred, parted themselves into Tens, or Decuries; and governed successively, by the space of five days, one Decury after another in order: yet so, that the Lictors, or Vigiles, carrying the Falces, or bundles of Rods and Axes, waited only upon the chief of them with these Ensigns of Power. This custom was retained in times of the Consuls, and put in use, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old year, to substitute new for the year following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to go as they would have it, there needed no more, than to let slip five days, and then was all to begin anew: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well assuaged. Upon such change of those that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawful unto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publicly declare themselves to seek those Offices. But no device would serve against the general favour born unto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed over; and the malice of the Fathers, against the Verue (as it was believed) of this mean, but worthy man, seemed to manifest, that when the People had urged the business to dispatch, only Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the Election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners were over-ruled. For whereas men of ordinary mark had stood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this unexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiency, and reputation, should be joyined with him, as both Companion and Opposite. So L. Aemilius Paulus, he who few years since had overcome the Illyrians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdom, was urged by the Nobility to stand for the place: which he easily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himself any more in such great business of the Commonwealth. For, notwithstanding his late good service, He, and M. Livius, that had been his Companion in Office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the People, and called unto judgment: wherein Livius was condemned, and Aemilius hardly escaped. But of this injustice they shall put the Romans well in mind, each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honourably approve their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most glorious loss; the other bravely winning, in the most happy Victory, that ever befel that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence, in preparing for the War: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what Wonders he would work, and that he would ask no more than once to have a fight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the providence and care of Paulus, travelled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote unto the two old Consuls, Servilius and Atilius; desiring them to abstain from hazard of the main chance; but nevertheless, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the Field, with the great Army which they were now levying, they might find the four old Legions well accustomed to the Enemy, and the Enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Masters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the slanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised it is uncertain. Four-score thousand Foot, at the least, and six thousand Horse, they were strong in the Field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Here, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their own Mercenaries; so did he now send help to Rome, a thousand Archers and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barley, and other Provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his own Estate would fall to ruin; that stood upright, by having them somewhat evenly balanced. He gave them also counsel, to send Forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might divert the War from Home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Otacilius the Prætor, which was to go into Sicily, that he should accordingly pass over into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The great Levies which the Romans made at this time, do much more serve to declare their puissance, than any, though larger, account by Poil, of such as were not easily drawn into the Field, and fitted for service. For besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily; twenty five thousand, with L. Posthumus Albinus, another of the Prætors, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Province, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to do as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip, the Son of Demetrius, King of Macedon; requiring him to deliver into their hands, Demetrius Phærius: who having been their Subject, and Rebel, was fled into his Kingdom. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their Tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What Answer they received, it is not known: only this is known, that Demetrius Phærius was not sent unto them; and that Philip henceforth began to have an eye upon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money; by the shifts that they were driven from after to make, it will appear, that the one half of it (how little soever) would have been welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cavil about forfeiture for non payment of the whole.

Whilst the City was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as near unto Hannibal as possibly they could, without incurring the necessity of a Battle. Many Skirmishes they had with him; wherein their success, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blighted the Honour of their other Services, but was indeed the occasion, to draw on the misery following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his force for the Winter. The Romans, to be near him, lodged about Cannus; and, that they might not be driven to turn aside for all Necessaries, to the loss of good Opportunities, they bestowed much of their Provisions in the Castle of Cannæ: for the Town was razed the year before. This place Hannibal wan; and thereby not only furnished himself, but compelled his Enemies to want many needful things, unless they would be troubled with far carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himself to abide in that open Country, fit for the service of his Horse: longer than the Romans, having for many mouths to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering Battle; which he most desired. Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand, how this Piece, taken by Hannibal, would serve him to command no small part of the Country adjacent; it then seemed needful, even unto the Fathers themselves, to adventure a Battle with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take root in the ground of Italy. Nevertheless answer was returned unto Servilius, that he should have patience yet a while: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to do as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the season of the year commodious to take the Field; the two Consuls, with their Army, set forth against Hannibal. This was always done with great Solemnity: especially, whenever they went forth to War against any noble or re-doubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemn Vows, were made unto Jupiter, and the rest of their Gods, for good Success and Victory: which being performed, the Generals, in warlike Attire, with an honourable train of the principal men, not only such as were of their Kindred and Alliance, or followed them to the War, as Volunteers, for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home, were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leave-taking, and good Wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Emilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthy of this Honour, or likely to do his Country remarkable Service. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a Troop no less in greatness, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is said to have exhorted the Consul Paulus, with many grave words, to shew his Magnanimity, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outrageous folly of his fellow Consul. The answer of Paulus was, That he meant not again to run into danger of condemnation, by offending the Multitude; that he would do his best for his Country; but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, He would think it less rashness to adventure upon the Enemies Sword, than upon the malice of his own Citizens.

S. VIII.

Disension between the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great Battle of Cannæ.

These new Generals, arriving at the Camp, dismissed M. Atinius, one of the last years Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakness: Servilius they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessary, was to hearthen his Soldiers with good words; who out of their bad success, hitherto, had gathered more cause of fear, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not only now, their Victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers: which were no less than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. He told them in what danger their Country stood; how the fate and safety thereof, rested upon their hands; using none such other common matter of persuasion. But the most effectual part of his Oration was, that Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one Victory by plain force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stolen the Honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Hereunto he taxed the inconsiderate rashness of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his Enemies, until he was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his Head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkness whereof he went groping (as it were blind-fold) into their snares. Finally, declaring what advantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and do their best. They were easily persuaded: for the contemplation of their own multitude, and confidence of the Roman virtue in matter of Arms, gave them cause to think, that under a Captain so well experienced, and every way sufficient, as Emilius was known to be, they should easily prevail against the Carthaginians: that came far short of them in all things else, save craft; which would not always thrive. But in one thing they mistook the meaning of their General. It was his desire, that they should have heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of waiting a convenient season. But they, having pre-conceived a Victory, thought all delays to be impediments: and thereby fought to rob themselves of their best help; which was, good conduct. They remembered what talk they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the vulgar desire, of ending the War quickly; wherein since Emilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forbear to use it? Thus thought the common Soldier: and thus also thought the Consul Terentius; who was no less popular in the Camp, than he had been in the City. Expectation is always tedious; and never more, than when the Event is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to be freed from the doubtful Passions of Hope and Fear: therefore Terentius, who fastened their desire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in the performance. Thus while the Romans think themselves to have the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Dilection of their chief Commanders. Varro would fight: Emilius would do so, too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the Enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into Places less fit for his Horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his last years provisions, return into Cannæ to gather a second Harvest? This would (said Varro) favour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth favour no less of C. Flaminius. Their deeds were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably every day. Emilius lodged six miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat uneven. Thither if the Carthaginians would take pains to come, he doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italy. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plains; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Nevertheless he fate down close by Hannibal: who as an unbidden Guest gave him but a rude welcome and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light Armadure, fell upon the Roman Vant-couriers; and put the whole Army in tumult, whilst it was yet in march: but they were overbold, now without loss, for that the Romans had, among their Velites, some Troops weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Emilius, who could not handily withdraw the Army out of that level ground, incamped upon the River Aufus; sending a third part of his Forces over the Water, to lie upon the Eastern Bank, where they entrenched themselves. He never was more unwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground served wholly for the advantage of his Enemy; with whom he meant to deal, when occasion should draw him to more equal terms. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himself; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Cannæ, or some other Place, where his force lay, for want of Necessaries: whereof an Army foraging the Country, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed over with silence, that Livy differeth much in his Relation from Polihius: telling many strange Tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had been driven; and of base courses that he devised to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (said Livy) but ten days provision of meat. He had not money to pay his Soldiers. They were an unruly Rabble, gathered out of several Nations, so that He knew not how to keep them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Provant, and afterwards for very Famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and run over to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himself was once upon the point, to have stolen away into Gaul with all his Horse, and left his Foot upon their miserable destinies. At length, for lack of all other counsel, He resolved to get him as far as he could from the Romans, into the Southernmost Parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his unfaitful Soldiers might find the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early harvest. But whilst he was about to put this device in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they even forced him unto that, which he most desired; even to fight a Battle upon open champion ground: wherein he was victorious. It was not uncommendable in Livy, to speak the best of his own Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their own great folly, they had done nothing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing only by report. For thus he saith; *Hannibal de fide in Galliam [disceit] agitasse; Hannibal [a iud] to have brought himself off, flying into Gaul: where he makes it no more than a matter of hear-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the process itself, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaul, through the Marishes and Bogs of Hætruria, could find Victuals enough, and all things needful unto his Army, the Summer foregoing; what should hinder him to do the like this year; especially seeing* ing he had play'd the careful Husband in making a great Harvest; since he had long been Master of the open Field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans provisions? Suitable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but Corn and Cattel; his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutiny for Pay. But he brought Gold with him into Italy; and had so well increased his stock, since he came into that Countrey, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with spoyl: having left wherewith to redeem as many of his own, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie to do the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the general agreement of Historians: who give it as a principal commendation unto Hannibal, That he always kept his Army free from Sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations; no less different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in Languages: and well might he so do, having not only pronounced, That which of his men soever fought bravely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnly protested and sworn, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserve and seek it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaul, was a senseless device. Hannibal, being there with his whole Army, took so little pleasure in the Countrey and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now do there with his Horse? or how could he be trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to live; having betrayed all his Army; and relinquish'd his miserable Foot, to the Butchery of their Enemies? This Tale therefore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the Life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his Directions from Livy. But of this and the like it is enough to say, That all Historians love to extol their own Countrey-men; and where a loss cannot be dissembled, nor the Honour of the Victory taken from the Enemy, and given unto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgovernment of their own Forces: as if they might easily have won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to find in them another time.

Now let us return back to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the River Ausidan. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in Honour, to make good his word unto the People of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vain, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to use his own Authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his own day came. When therefore it was his turn to command; at the first break of day he began to pass the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former Times, to have dissuaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrey to a needless hazard. Against whose words and substantial Arguments, Terentius could alledge none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them Batel at their Trenches: should they endure this Bravado? He had sent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fell upon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesser Camp; and drave them shamefully to run within their defences, which also they made offer to assail: must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of such courage, as promised assured Victory. When Amilius perceived, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; he took all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman Foot he caus'd to be left behind, in the greater Camp, opposite unto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled, to leave behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity he was less able to spare from the Batel, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling upon the Carthaginian Camp, when the Fight began, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly do such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heat of Fight. This done; the two Consuls went over the water with their Army to the lesser Camp, whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of Batel: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and, without any delay, pass'd likewise over, somewhat higher up the stream, which ran from the South; leaving in his own Camp so many, as he thought would serve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He had them look about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joyn Batel with the Romans upon such a level ground, where the stronger in Horse are sure to prevail? They all assented to him; and shewed by their Countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said he further) ye are first of all to thank the Gods, that have brought them hither; and then us, that have trained them along, and drawn them into necessity of playing for their lives, where they are sure to lose them. As for these Romans, I was fain to encourage you against them, when ye met them first: but now ye may even encourage your selves, by calling to mind that they are the men, whom ye have as often beaten as seen. Of one thing only I will put you in mind: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects; as, to drive them before you out of Gaul; and to win the open Countrey, and Fields of Italy; both of which ye have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Towns themselves, and all the Riches within them; which this Victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many hours pass, ye shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this; his Brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the Countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, What news; and what work they were likely to have with these Romans? Work enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee Brother, that among them all, search them never so diligently, thou shalt not find one man, whose Name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladdened the Souldiers, who thought their General would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his Victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no less troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant only to correct the sad mood of his Brother with a jest, and shew himself merry unto the Souldiers: this his Answer was was more manly, than was the Relation of his discovery. But if Hannibal himself had been sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans; he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gam, before the Battle of Agincourt, made unto our King Henry the fifth: saying, that of the French-men, there were enough to be killed; enough to be taken Prisoners; and enough to run away. Even such words as these, or such pleasant Jest as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serve many times, when Battle is at hand, to work upon such passions, as must govern more of the business: especially, where other needful care is not wanting; without which they are but vain boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginians excelled himself; expressing no less perfection of his military skill, than was greatness in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousness of the Place, into which he had long before conceived the means to draw his Enemies to Battle; He marshalled his Army in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might do best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Balaers, he sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose Troops, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French Name Enfans perdus; but when we used our own terms, the Forlorn hope. The gross of his Army following them he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the Spoils which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the use of those weapons, that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings, very deep in File. Between these he ranged his Gauls and Spaniards, armed, each after their own Countrey manner; their Shields alike; but the Gauls using long broad Swords, that were forcible in a downright stroke; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed Blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gauls, naked from their Navel upwards, as confident in their own fierceness; the Spaniards, wearing white Caslocks embroidered with purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in quality, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gauls were strong of Body, and furious in giving charge; but soon wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were less eager, but more wary; neither ashamed to give ground, when they were over-pressed; nor afraid to return, and renew the Fight, upon any small encouragement. As the roughness of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firm temper; so the Place which they held in this Battle, added confidence jointly unto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose Name was grown terrible in Spain, by their Conquests; and in Gauls, by this their present War. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamity should fall upon them, whilst the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to imploy the utmost of their hardihoods, as knowing that the Enemy could not press far upon them, without further engaging himself than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in Horse: by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retreat. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Despiration begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gauls and Spaniards to advance; leaving void the Place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall back, when they should be over-hardly pressed. So, casting them into the form of a Crescent, He made them as it were his Vanguard: the two points of this great half Moon, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawn it, being narrow and thin, as serving only to guide it orderly back, when need should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the Enemies, being well strengthened and thickened against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have been so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behind it: though such Figures, cut in brass, as I have seen of this Battle, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appear: as also in the same Figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Rear, to second the Gauls and Spaniards; when they were driven to retreat; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood between the last ranks of his long Battalions, and in the head of his Rear, doubtless well accompanied with the choice of his own Nation. Between the left Battalion and the River Ausidus, were the Gauls and Spanish Horse, under the Command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plains, was Hanno (Livy saith Mabarbal) with the Numidian light Horse. Hannibal himself, with his Brother Mago, had the leading of the Rear. The whole sum of Hannibal's Army in the Field this day, was ten thousand Horse, and forty thousand Foot; his Enemies having two to one against him in Foot; and He, five to three against them in Horse.

The Roman Army was marshalled in the usual form: but somewhat more narrow, and deep, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had been found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former War. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Rear, that it might stand fast compacted as a Wall, under shelter wherof the disordered Troops might re-ally themselves. Thus much it seems, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battels accordingly, as meaning to show more skill, than was in his understanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the Field: their advantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of embattelling was very unprofitable, so far as their charge is better sustained in front, than upon a long flank. As for Emilius; it was not his day of Command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yield for very weariness unto the more contentious. Upon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman Horse-men, under the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the Horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Servilius the former years Consul, had the leading of the Battle. The Sun was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward; the Romans toward the South.

After some light Skirmish between the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and Slingers of the Balaers: Asdrubal brake upon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountered; not after the manner of service on Horse-back, used in those times, wheeling about Alman-like, but each giving on in a right a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand, so that there was no way left, but to pierce and break through. Wherefore they not only used their Lances and Swords, but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grappled one another : and so their Horfes running from under them, fell many to the ground ; where starting up again, they began to deal Blows like Floemen. In conclusion, the Roman Horfe were over-born, and driven by plain force to a staggering recoil. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boistrous Gauls and Spaniards, was not to be reffited by these Roman Gentlemen, unequal both in number, and in Horsefanship. When the Battels came to jouncing, the Roman Legionaries found work enough, and somewhat more than enough to break that great Crescent, upon which they first fell : so strongly for the while, did the Gauls and Spanish Foot make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their Battel drew towards the midst ; by whose aid, these Opposites were forced to disband, and fly back to their first place. This they did in great haste and fear, and were with no less haste and folly pursued. Upon the Africans that stood behind them, they needed not to fall foul, both for that there was void room enough, and forasmuch as the safe Retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time should require. In this hasty Retreat, or Flight of the Gauls and Spaniards ; it happened, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the Limb or utter Compass of the half Moon made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turn the inside outward, the Horns or points thereof, as yet untouched, only turning round, and recoiling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in a half Circle : which they should not have needed greatly to regard (for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken ; and the bottom of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming unable to make resistance) had all the Enemies foot been cast into this one great Body, that was in a manner disolved. But whilst the Legions, following their supposed Victory, rushed on upon those that stood before them, and thereby unwittingly engaged themselves deeply within the principal strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands ; the two African Battalions on either side advanced fo far, that getting beyond the Rear of them, they inclosed them, in a manner, behind : and forward they could not pass far, without removing Hannibal and Mago, which made that way the least easy. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behind it undisturbed, until now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled insecure, and that they behaved themselves as men that thought upon no other work, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would have been so mad, as to run headlong with the whole bulk of their Army, into the Throat of slaughter, had they seen those Weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of Fight, and rashness of inferior Captains : but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in War, being vanquished in Horfe, had put himself among the Legions ; it cannot be supposed, that he and they did willfully thus engage themselves.

Asdrubal having broken the Troops of Roman Horfe, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed upon them along the River side, beating down, and killing as many as he could (which were almost all of them) without regard of raising Prisoners. The Consul himself was either driven upon his own Legions, or willingly did cast himself among them, as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the Defeat of his Horfe. But he failed of this his expectation. Nevertheless he cheered up his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his own stout behaviour : beating down, and killing many of the Enemies with his own hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the Battel ; and with better success. For the Consul received a Blow from a Sling, that did him great hurt : and though a Troop of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to save him from further harm, yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled by Wounds and Weakness, to forsake his Horfe. Hereupon all his Company alighted, thinking that the Consul had given order so to do, as in many Battels, the Roman men at Arms had left their Horfes, to help their Foot in distress. When Hannibal (for he was near at hand) perceived this, and understood that the Consul had killed his Horfe-men to dismount. He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would have delivered them unto me bound hand and foot : meaning, that he had them now almost as fast as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the Horfe of the Associates, in the left Wing, was marvelously troubled by Hanno (or Mabarbal) and the Numidians : who beating up and down about that great sandy Plain, raised a foul dust, which a strong South-wind, blowing there accidentally, drove into the Eyes and Mouths of the Romans. These using their advantage both of number and of lightness, wearied the Consul and his Followers exceedingly, neither giving nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the Battels were even ready to join, five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their Fellows, with their Shields cast behind their backs (as was the manner of those which yielded) and throwing down their Arms, rendered themselves. This was good luck to begin withal, if there had been good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them, but called them, unarmed as they were, to get them behind the Army, where he bad them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty adventurers did as he bad them for a while, till they found opportunity to put in execution the purpose for which they had thus yielded. Under their Jackets they had short Swords and Ponyards, besides which, they found other scattered Weapons about the Field, of such as were slain, and therewithal flew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilst all eyes and thoughts were bent another way, so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater error. Thus Hannibal, in a plain level ground, found means to lay an Ambush at the back of his Enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Asdrubal having in short space broken the Roman Troops of Horfe, and cut in pieces all, save the Company of Emilius that rushed into the grofs of his Foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, between the River and their own Battalions ; did not stay to charge charge upon the face of the Legions, but fell back behind the Rear of his own, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians, with whom he joyed, and gave upon Terentius. This fearful cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behind it, on the other side : so did it prognosticate a dismal Storm unto those, upon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his Followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and feeling more work toward than they could hope to sustain ; thought it the best way to avoid the danger by present flight. The Consul was no less wise than they, in apprehending the greatness of his own peril ; nor more desperate, in striving to work impossibilities : it being impossible, when so many thrunk from him, to sustain the impression alone, which he could not have endured with their assistance. Now he found that it was one thing to talk of Hannibal at Rome, and another to encounter him. But of this, or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his present leisure would not serve him to consider. Close at the heels of him and his flying Troops, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal unto the pursuit, as fittest for that service. Asdrubal himself, with the Gauls and Spanish Horfe, compassing about, fell upon the backs of the Romans, that were, in this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else. He brake them easily, who before made ill resistance, being inclosed and laid at on every side, not knowing which way to turn. Here began a pitiful Slaughter : the vanquished Multitude thronging up and down, they knew not whether, or which way, whilst every one fought to avoid those Enemies, whom he saw nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got up to Horfe, and saved themselves : which though it is hardly understood how they could do ; yet I will rather believe it, than suppose that Livy fo reporteth, to grace thereby his History with this following Tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place, where he saw the Consul sitting all bloodied upon a Stone, entreated him to rise and save himself, offering him his assistance and Horfe. But Paulus refused it, willing Lentulus to shift for himself, and not to lose time in saving him. That it was not his purpose to be brought again into Judgment by the People, either as an Accuser of his Colleague, or as guilty himself of that days loss. Further, he wished Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius : willing them to forgive Rome as fast and as well as they could ; and telling Fabius, that he loved and died mindful of his whole (some counsel. These words (peradventure) or some to like purpose, the Consul uttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawn to that Battel, or when he beheld the first Defeat of his Horfe, at what time he put himself in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he said a good while before this ; when he thought the Consul and his Troop, in little better case than if they had been bound. The whole Grofs of the Romans was inclosed indeed as within a Sack, whereof the African Battalions made the sides, the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottom, and Asdrubal with his Horfe, closed up the Mouth : in which part, they first of all were shuffled together, and began the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Emilius therefore, who could not fit his Horfe, whilst the Battel yet lasted, and whilst the Spaces were somewhat open, by which he might have withdrawn himself : was now (had he never fo well been mounted) unable to fly, having in his way fo close a Throng of his own miserable Followers, and so many heaps of Bodies, as left space in that great Carnage. It sufficed unto his Honour ; That in the Battel he fought no less valiantly, than he had usually before, both abfained himself, and dissuaded his Fellow Consul from fighting at all. If, when the day was utterly lost, it had lain in his power to save his own Life, unto the good of his Country, never more needing it ; I should think, that he either too much diffemmed himself, or being too faintly minded, was weary of the World, and his unthankful Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Emilius, as proceeding out of Roman Valour, then was the English Virtue of the Lord John Talbot, Vicount Lisle, Son to that famous Earl of Shrewsbury, who died in the Battel of Chapillon, more highly to be honoured. For Emilius was old, grievously, if not mortally wounded, and accountable for the Overthrow received : Talbot was in the flower of his Youth, unhurt, easily able to have escaped, and not answerable for that days misfortune, when he refused to forsake his Father ; who foreseeing the loss of the Battel, and not meaning to stain his actions past by flying in his old Age, exhorted this his noble Son to be gone and leave him.

In this terrible Overthrow died all the Roman Foot, five two or three thousand, who (as Livy faith) escaped into the lesser Camp, whence, the same night, about six hundred of them break forth, and joining with such of those in the greater Camp, as were willing to try their Fortune, conveyed themselves away ere morning, about four thousand Foot, and two hundred Horfe, partly in whole Troops, partly dispersed into Cannusium : the next day, the Roman Camps, both less and greater, were yielded unto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this Escape : only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Emilius had left on the West side of the Asopus (as was shewed before) to set upon the Camp of Hannibal, did as they were appointed, but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-near done, the Battel was lost, and Hannibal coming over the Water to them, drave them into their own Camp, which they quickly yielded, having lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first fight of Hannibal, coming upon them with his victorious Army, a great number of these did fly, and thereby escaped, whilst their Fellows making defence in vain, retired into their Camp, and held the Enemy buied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps Liv. l. 19. not half full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that having served at Cannus, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting : Of the Roman Horfe, what numbers escaped, it is uncertain : but very few they were that saved themselves in the first charge, by getting behind the River ; and Terentius the Consul recovered Venusia, with three-score and ten at the most in his company. That he was so ill attended, it is no marvel : for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward ; fo that his nearest way thither, had been through the midst of Hannibals Army, if the Passage had been open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of fight, he turned up some by way, fo disappointing the Numidians that hunted contr. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but took other ways, and were scattered over the Fields ; two thousand, and thereabouts, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made Prisoners : the rest were slain, all save three hundred ; who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into sundry Towns. There died in this great Battel of Canna, besides L. Aemilius Paulus the Consul; two of the Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, and one and twenty Colonels or Tribunes of the Soldiers, fourscore Senators, or such as had born Office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especial mark, as having been Ædiles, Prætors, or Consuls, among whom was Cn. Servilius the last years Consul, and Mimius, late Master of the Horse. The number of Prisoners taken in this Battel, Livy makes no greater than three thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse: too few to have defended, for the space of one half hour, both the Roman Camps; which yet the same Livy saith, to have been over-cowardly yielded up. We may therefore do better, to give credit unto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no less than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemy spared, when the fury of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yielded in the greater Camp, when their Company were either slain or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varro, had before cast up (as we say) without their Host; nothing to chargeable, as now they find it. On the side of Hannibal there died some four thousand Gauls, fifteen hundred Spaniards, and Africans, and two hundred Horse, or thereabouts: a loss not sensible, in the joy of so great a Victory: which if he pursued, as Mabarchus advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Wars had prefgandy been at an end. But he believed not so far in his own prosperity, and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to use a Victory.

Of things following the Battel at Canna.

NO without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, unto whose Honour they consecrated their Travels, than the truth of things, and information of Posterity, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and Proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quæstors and Fathers conscripti. No man of sound judgment will condemn this liberty of Censure, which Polybius hath used. For, to recompence his Juniority (such as it was) he produceth substantial arguments, to justify his own Relation; and confute the vanity of those former Authors, out of their own Writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which pains it is to be suspected, that he would not have taken, had he been born in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and been contented to have all men think better and more honourably than it deserved of his own Country. The like defence it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter find in others; and shall have cause to wish, that either they were somewhat less Roman, or else, that some Works of their oppositive Writers were extant, that so we might at least hear both sides speak: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his help, that was a man indifferent. But since this cannot be, we must be
